It was, indeede, the maine defire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus fo hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leifure, pursue their businesse in Sicil: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too highminded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. 20 Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued, with coucnants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reseruation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vling all meanes to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon enery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor fauer, yet hee cleane descated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first be- 40

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking, had beene so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to beleeue, that an higher prouidence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inueterate; that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an haruest, by how much their cost and paynes therein buried had beene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses, and by force or practice, recouered in few yeeres, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citic of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselves to deale with 50

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathoeles, being intertained within Messana as friends, and finding themsclues too strong for the Citizens, tooke advantage of the power, that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crneltie, flew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wines, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercinaries called themselves Maniertines. Good Souldiers they were : and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approue their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their floutnesse. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouerranne the Countrie round about them.

of the Historie of the World.

In this course, at first, they sped so wel, that they did not onely desend Messiena against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syracustans, and others, but 10 they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast vpou them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerful Armic besieged the Citic, It happened ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracustian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so farre, that the Armie elected two Gouernours, among themselves ; to wit, Artemidorus, and Hicron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policy of that State, to approue any election made 20 by the Souldiers, yet for the great elemencie hee yied at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made douernour. This Office, hee rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his pre-

CHAP. I. S.2.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtayning, and fafe keeping, of the place he fought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and eafily moued to fedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hec tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the 30 Syracustans. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citic, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would have affaulted it in two feueral parts, he marched away under the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the affieged: So returning home, and leavying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well tray ned and obedient, he hafted againe towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Mylaum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captine into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and faluted King. Hereupon the 40 Mamertines, finding themselues vtterly infeebled, some of them resolued to give themselues to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the severall factions dispatched Embassadours for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone readic to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, wherof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Towne referued for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Cap-50 taine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Mef-Sana, as a Towne that rebelled, having once beene theirs. Hieron, the new made King of Syracufe (to gratifie his people, incenfed with the smart of injuries lately receiucd) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hecentred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were Ddddd 2 closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armic on the one side of the Towne, whilest Hieron with his Syracusans, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Confull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicil: which paffing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselse into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthagmians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; fignifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to give them protection, even by force of warre, if reason would not prevaile.

This message was veterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betweene Rome 10 and Cottage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the justice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have beene first considered.

ò. III.

The beginning of the fift Punick warre. That it was uninftly undertaken by the Romans.

218

Hen Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to scize vponit in that busic time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, confifting of foure thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and affored for the present. But after a while this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which feuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the 30 odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resoluted finally, to make the like purchace, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hofts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoile, and all which that State had among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more scuere profession of justice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolued, after a while, to take revenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie, by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for 40 the foulenesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinateresolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrie, they had their heads ftricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and estates.

This execution of justice being newly performed, and the fame thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readineffe to inflict the like punishment voon the Mamertines, for the like offence. An 50 impudent request it was, which they made: who having both giuen example of that vilanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good, intreate the Iudges to give them that affishance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-theeues. The

The Romans could not suddenly resolue, whether the way of honeslie, or of profit, were to be followed; they enermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They confidered, how contrarie the course of succouring the Mamertines was, to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the fword, their owne Souldiers, and reftored the oppressed to their libertic. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginean Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best parts of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of spaine, and some part of Sicil it selfe: whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a Citie in beautie and riches, to little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they(driven to despaire by the Romans)should deliver vp Messana, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing fland betweene Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sicil: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of fuccour, any long time fubfift, if once the Carthaginians, that were Mafters of the Sca, did taften upon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the oportunitie of Mesana was such, as would not only debarre, all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicil; but would ferue as a bridge, wherby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatned from a farre, did so prevaile, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Confull, presently dispatcht away for Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arriuall; and lesse moued, with his requiring them, to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was readie to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well understood: and against all this, he thought the stiffe metall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient reme-30 die. Therefore, herefolued to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to fend them away from the Towne; not to be befreged by them within it. In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemie lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto hee had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought fo) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him. 40 The Syracufian wanted not courage to fight, but furely, hee wanted good advice:

else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten; and driven to faue himfelfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisedome, that stood him and his Kingdome in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must have sought 50 helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities ) but a small stock, which it behooved him to gouerne well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their aduentures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armic gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritic of his fouldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemie for sooke both field and campe, leaving all the Countrie open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay fiege vnto the great Citic of Syracule.

These prosperous beginnings, how soeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater losses than this, in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of warre to

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, wheref one part had alreadie admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any fuch furrendric, in the publike name of all 20

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull furrendric of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans affilt the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves consessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point seruing to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Outlawes, Murderers, or fuch other malefactours, can by any good successe of their vilanie, obtaine the priviledge of civill societies, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, 30 as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is ving the sword of vengeance against them, without becomming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may effecmethis action of the Romans, so farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they justly descrued to be warred vpon themselues, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Mes-Sana had beene taken, and the Mamertines all flaine, ere any newes of the Confede- 40 racie had beene brought vnto the beliegers. The great Alexander was so farre perfwaded berein; that he did put to fword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, not withstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Companie of Milesians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which these of their posteritie enjoyed. Neuerthelesse, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives ius acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth freethe descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose vilanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeues, which by a dete- 50 stable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by fome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime: as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironside, Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of juflice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her felfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to ground.

ð. IIII.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

t. I.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the first Inhabitants thereof.

He defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, fince the first victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present

That Sieil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest se-10 uered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionyfius, affirme, that it was caufed by an carthquake; Si- Plinitage at lius, and Cassiedorus, doe thinke it to have beene done by the rage and violence of silling the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Euba scuered from Baotia; Atalante and Macri, from Euba; Sillie here in England. from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their cares to fables, do attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iscastus, the sonne of Eolus, divided it 40 from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Ille; that by that meanes, hee might the more fafely inhabite, and possesse that came. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sun-orionda, site. dring it from Italie, to Orion : who, that he might be compared to Herenles (cutting Diod.l.o. through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did Ouid de Fast. 40

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Enstatbins and Strabo, who affirme this. not only to excell the reft for bigneffe, but also for goodneffe of soile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela faith, it is like that Capitall letter of 50 the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was confecrated to Geres and Proferpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceresit was dedicated, becauseit first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne to Proserpina, not so much, for that thee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plu-tarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as shee, vncouering her selte, first she wed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he faith, that Marcus Cate did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar fort. The fame Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (faith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. What soeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (faith Solinus) 10 whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that arc of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-growne with faffron. Diodorus Siculus faith, that in the fields, neere vnto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonies, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre, there be many other things, which have made it very renowned, as the 20 birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proferpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Eina. Scylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painful Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lastriagones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Hand. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thueydides and Dio-dorus doe constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Sicali; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (faith Philistus) eightic yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Meffena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it selfe, beating from thence the Etolians, who long before had fet vp a Towne in that place. 40 As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Atolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nea, Hybla, Trinacia, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Sicula were divided, and by a civill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient Rorles, see finde the last voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thuey dides, 50 an Historian of unquestionable finceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Hands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus flecing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his aboade there, he built a place of great strength, necre vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treasure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramme in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Fenus Erycina; which he did with so great arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dedalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own strength, promiseth to deliuer Dadalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills 10 Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it feemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Siculi, Hercunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their consent, and builded for themselves the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand children of Minos serued with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans vnderstood, that their King had by treason beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to invade Cocalus; and landing neere vnto Camicus, they belieged the same fine yeares, but in vaine. In the 20 end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coast of Italie; and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had loft, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brundusium, and Tarensum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Tapyges, and Messapi.

After the taking of Troy, Ageftus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and feated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Leefta and Elyma.

It is faid, that Aneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sicil: 30 whereof there want not good Authours, that make Aneas himselfe the founder.

About the same time, the Phanicians seised upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybaum, and vpon certaine small Isles adjoyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified to fecure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambig, and other places. But the Phanicians staied not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance feeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were faid to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phanicia, Agypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orefles, Intaus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus: as Scythia, Saxo G.iapra-Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous; did not Moses make vs know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Mosb; Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants : and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Wi- furr. 50 sephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many o- Aug.de civit. ther Authours, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vefputius, in his second Nauiga- Deilis. Et

tion into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those Niceph.l.2.6.37. parts. Againe, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of Procop. 1. a.de any one ; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on a- Bello Golb.

cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the coucring of their bodies, with the skins of bealts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first pasfages ouer great Rivers, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with faile; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts: as of Husbandric, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnesse of time, which we call old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge 10 of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and consusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we have now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; infomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the 20 skinnes of beafts, not only to filke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quamlonga dies peperit, longiorá, auxit, longisima subruit; Long time brought forth longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall over throw it.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

Hen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driven vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benesit of this case conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theoeles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. 40 Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians ( who thought themselves to bee well enough alreadie) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubwans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wifer than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they * Syracufe, as had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. was the grea- Archias of Corinth followed the Eubwans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, tell, and most called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a goodly Citie of all that the Greeker posses. For the situation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect, from every entrance, by Land, or Sca. The Port was (for the most part) environmed with beautifull building: and that part which was without the Citic, was on both sides bankt vp, and sufficiently with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citic is Gets. on both sides bankt vp, and sustained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it selfe was one of the greatest of the World : for it had in compasse (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. surlongs; which made of our miles about 18. It was compounded of four e Citees, (Strabo saith, of fine) to wit, Insila, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatnesse, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet witnesse.

wall, which the Ltolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, In-Afterfuchtime fula. He with his Corinthians having over-come the Siculi, drave them vp into the as the Dores of Countrie; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increasing, they added vnto the Peloponess had Citie of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the comdriven out the modity of the double Port, capable of a many thing, and Neapolis. modity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Hauen of that part of goodly Citie, Europe, as by the fertilitie of the foyle; Syracuse grew vpin great haste, to be one of for a long time became the the goodliest Townes of the World. In short time the Greekes did possess the bet-feat of Tyrants ter part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the Thesist wherfast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in The second,

CHAP.I. S.4. 1.2.

Some seuen yeares after the arrivall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by derribe third, the successe of the Corinthians, did affaile, and obtains the Citie of Leontum, built The fourth, and possest by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their and fift, Dieny-Affociates, the Cities of Catana, and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that fins, the elder, forcist show called Magare.

About five and fortie yeares after Archias had taken Syracufe; Antiphemus and The fewenth Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sicil, eight, Physbus and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did creet that The ninth, magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes hiere the yon-of the Deviane 20 of the Dorians.

The Syracustans also, in the seuentieth yeare after their plantation, did set vp the nymus: who be-Citie of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Casmena, in the Playnes Lontium, at adjoyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth years of their dwelling in length the Ro-Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the mans conque Iland. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recouer from the Siculi the Citie of the conduction Zancle, which they had founded in the streight betweene Sicil and Italie. They of Marcellus. of Zancle had beene founders of Himera.

Not long after this Dorieus the Lacedemonian built Heraclia; which the Phanicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soone after in-30 naded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their owne Countrie, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this

of the government and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIVS bis Tyrannie.

THe most part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braffe, wherein to enclose men, and scortch them to death: prayling the denice with this commendation; That the noise of one tor-50 mented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by causing the first triall to be made vpon himselfe. Heeraigned one and thirtie yeares, faith Eulebius; others give him but fixteene: Howfoeuer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, enen whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their libertic, and enjoyed it long, till Thero viurped the governement of the Common-weale: at which time also Panetius made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, having ruled seven yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippoerates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messen, and of Leontium; whom with divers other of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. Hee also made warre with the Syraussand, in the end, got from them, by composition, the Citie of 10 Camerina. But when he had raigned seven yeares, he was slaine in a battell against the Sieuli, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracustans change their forme of Gouernement, from Popular to Aristocraticall; a preparation towards a Principalitie, whereinto it was soone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sieil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed with him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possessing the trust committed with him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possessing the trust committed with him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possessing the trust committed with one case of a contention in Syracuse, 20 betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Gouernours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and sindeede) the most famous, that ever gouerned the Syracustins. This change hapned in the second yeare of the threescore and twelsth o-lympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also nsurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and The assume to the first of which hee gaue up the Citic of Gela, when hee had obtay ned the Principalitie of Syracus. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the strengthning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracus. He defaced 30 Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracus who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracus. The Megarians that had moved a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer fort he brought to Syracus and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon like occation. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentimes, having dispossific Terillus, of his Citic Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messens, father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also sollicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diversions the Carthaginians, and other Asircans, led by Amilear, were overthrowne by Ge-Merod. & Diod. lon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellespont. Hee, for their reliefe having armed thirtie thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, resusted neuerthelesse to send them into Greece. heecause they resusted him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So he vsed to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the slower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse received, searing the invasion of their owne Countrie, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their 50 children to Saturne; That they should pay him two thousand talents of silver; and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousands talents, and the ships for warre, they sent unto Demarata; Gelon's wise, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sieil in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subiects, he left the World, and left for his Succession his brother Hiero. Philiss and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered him-felse to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suto spicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conversation which hee had with simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Divers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Nerves had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the fuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also overthrew in battaile Thrasydeus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had raigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thrasphulus, who 20 became a most vnjust and bloudie Tyrant. Thrasybulus enjoyed his Principalitie no longer then ten moneths. For, not with standing the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracufe by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradma, hee restored the government, and was banished the Hand. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusans recoursed againstheir former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer sought, had the Successours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracus. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answere the acquisition. Where a 30 liberall, valiant, and adulted Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behouseth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and arte, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, cre shee could clense her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well-neare threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though she were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they 40 deuised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking parterne from the Athenian Oftracifme. They called this their new denifed judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein every one wrote vpon an Olive leafe (as at Athens the v wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would have expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for fine yeares. Hereby, in ashort time, it came to passe, that those of judgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either supprest, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could: seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselues. And good reason they had so to does 50 seeing there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not long. For their necessitie taught them to abolishit, and restore againe the wifer fort to the Gouernment; from which, the Nobilitie having practifed to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had alreadie taken Enna, and some other of the Grasian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agregentines the Syracustans sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs called Bolcon. This their Gaptaine made nothing so much haste to finde Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led. as foone as Ducetius presented him battaile. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leuie other troups: by whom, inconclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himfelfe, and is constrained to leave the Hand for a time. Yet it was not long, ere hee returned againe, and built the Citic Collatina on the Sea-side.

Dusetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracufe: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourescore and fift olympiad,

they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enjoy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being opprest by them, secke aide from the Athenians, about the sixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought 20 by Sophooles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans, wanne and lost divers places: tooke Messana; and, in the seuenth yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which inuaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselues on all hands, and yet could fee none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themselves in sicil, by the division and civill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by 30 the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banillaed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heany fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syracusians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppress the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians undertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedamon was fent 40 to the Syracusians. The Lacedamonians dealt plainely, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend : for their preparations were so great, as discouered their intent to be none other, then the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleeue their owne eies, which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citic of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short 50 space of time. For the Lacedamonians (as hath alreadic beene shewed in due place) flood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spare cost in this great expeditio, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were flacke abroad. And furely, had not the defire of the Athenians beene ouer-paffionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to referue their forces for a more needfull vse. But yong counsailes prevailed against the authoritic of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safetie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene alreadie made, in that which wee have written of the Peloponnesian warre, But what was there deliuered in general termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequece; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil

10 was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voiage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to reestablish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians, as also, by force of armes, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents, in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were fent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and flue thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which 20 transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men.

With these troups and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to giuethem entrie; but sell them victualls for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their fakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres; that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with falle shewes of gold, having in all but thirtie talents. The Atherians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and 30 allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduleth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egeflans could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sieil to confederacie against the Syracusans and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perswades them to affaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana: & there they take new counfaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egista, who 40 received from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentietalents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to affaile Syracus. But Alcibiades having been caccused at home, in his absence, was sent for backe by the Athenians, to make his answere: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusans, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their 50 best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at faire case, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracufians had the loffe: but the Ashenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselues, with a resolutio to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season.

From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discouered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messenians. This he now did, in despight of his owne Citizens. the Athensans; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof heing affured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedamonians, and to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his countrey. While this winter yet lasted, the syracustans send Embassadours to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Speil, fend to Athens, for Supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth years of the Pelopennesian warre) the Athenians in Sicil, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, forfaken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Countrie, they obtaine some small victories over the straggling Syracusians: and at their returne to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestans, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a companie of Archers and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracustans, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments, 20 They also received from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hudred other horse to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, fo, as hardly any fuccours could enter, but fuch as were able to force their paffage: yet the Athenians receive divers loffer; among which it was not the leaft, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylyppus, and Python, with the Lacedamonian, and Corinthian forces arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; fo that with these and his own troups, Gylippes aduentured to march over-land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to en- 30 counter them, expecting his arrival neere vnto the Citic, vpon a place of advantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicios to fortifie himselfe within his Campe, Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians, shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost together with the small Armic remaining. These letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demosthenes, to joyne with Wicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylyppus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, fomtimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from them their Fort, neere vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians loft their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) belieged within Athens, by the Lacedamonians; yet were they most obstinate in profecuting the Warre in Sicil, and dispatched away Demostheres with new fuccours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthe sthe Cornthian, with his flecte: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil; the one to succour Nicias; the other, Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect e- 50 quall, and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the fuccours arrived to either, Gylppus and Arifton had affailed the Athenians in the great Port of Spracufe, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the flouth of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracufians, the same day that he arrived. But he made more hafte, than he had good speede, being shamefully beaten. and repulfed with great loffe. Hereupon Demosthenes and Enrymedon, determine to rile vo from before Syracuje, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracule. whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

of the Historie of the World.

What soener Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arrivall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had 10 not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracusans. Lacedamonians, and Corinthians, with threefcore and seventeene saile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians, in the same Port encountred them with fourescore and fixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian flect was beaten, by the leffer number, and Eurymedon flaine. Now, though it were fo, that the Syracufians received the more losse by Land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themsclues inuincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylip-

20 pus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselues vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselves that they exceede all others, they not only loofe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies funck and wrackt, had seventeene taken, and possess by the enemie; and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, having drawne them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduisedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by

CHAP. I.S. 4. 1.3.

The Syracusians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolue to imprison 30 them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veffels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracuftan fleet; which lay but fingle, because they were forst torange themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and layd behinde them againe certaine ships, which served in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were funke; or the chaine, which joined them to their fellowes, broken; the Athenians might yet finde 40 themselues a second time intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a paffage.

the Syraen frans had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of loofe ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vesfell, vling oare or failes, is broken, and their speede fore-flowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the relissance opposing.

On the other fide, the Athenians knew that they were veterly loft, except with an inumcible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolue to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hun-50 dred and ten, of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-armic, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, cre they came to force the bridge, as, albeit fome few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being stopt by the ships without, and affailed by other loofe Gallies of the Syracusians, which were purposely left at large in the Sea.

they were either taken or sunke. Three great disaduantages the Athenians had: the first that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a streight, they had no roome to turne themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the fecond, that having ouer-peftered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vied offenfine armes of darts and flings, they had not place vpon the decks to firetch their armes: the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paffage, by which they might faue themselues by running away. To be short, the fight was no lesse terrible than the confusion; the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, 10 with loffe of threescore of their Gallies, broken, sunke, or abandoned. The Syracu-Gans did also loose twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottome of the Port, faued themselves by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counsell. Demosthenes perswades them, to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained: and while the Syraculians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victorie, to fet voon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens, This was no ill counsaile. For, as we have heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greatest number of all that have beene victorious) that have neglected the speedie 20 profecution of a beaten enemie; so might we produce many examples of those. who, having flept fecurely in the bosome of good successe, have beene suddenly awaked by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue therby loft againe all the honour, and advantage, formerly gotten. But Wisias opposeth the advice of Demostheres: Others say, that the Sea-men were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all refolue to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more fauourable fortune should call them thence. On the other fide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedamonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermoerates, exhort the Syraculians to put themselves presently into the field, and to flop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians 30 might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadez, lost vs both the Indian fleet, and the spoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracusian, finding it a lost labour. to perswade his Countrimen to any hastie prosecution, deuised this good stratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had affured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away ouer-haftily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleaging that the Syracusians had lodged their Ar- 40 mie, which could not long stay there, vpon the passages & places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Wicias easily beleeved, and put off his journie to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearefull than wife; and to them, every thiftle in the field, appeares, by night,

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of fortie thousand; and make their first passage by force, ouer the River of Anapu, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies. But being 50 every day charged in their marches, & by the Syracusian horse-men, beaten in from forraging, and provision of soode, they grow weake and heartlesse. The Syracusians also possesses the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to passe towards Camerizan, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea coast, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as having none other meanes to cleape from the enemie that purfued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmilhing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the hart of a whole nights march, leaving Demosthenes to make the retrait : who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could have hoped for ; and the faith of his enemies farre worse to than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being diffolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the River Asinarus, rendred himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta, Wicias, as a noble enemie to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had faued the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Armic, dissiwaded the rest, by all the artehenad, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly fort, (co-20 wardise and crueltie, being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee starued in lothfome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the river 1 smarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the foure fore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egeftans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syraculians, fought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their Citie, as their Vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sieil, yet considering the prosperitie of the Syracustans, 30 and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they staied a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracustans, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embaffadours to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracustans approved the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracufians, 40 with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interpoling as Arbitrators, in a bulines, that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haueit. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracufe; and the Syracufians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannihal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of 50 them having beene staine by the Himerans; the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilear was slaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of

Hermocrates,

Hermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre prevailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedamonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein hee did great seruice. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorie for the injurie done vnto him, and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he begannet or epaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the love of his Citizens. But the saction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was adulted to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might have the better meanes to rise against the adverse partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set upon him; in which conslict hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionyssus, shall make them wish Hermocrates alive againe.

t. IIII.

of Dionysivs the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracus.

The Syracusians had enjoyed their libertie about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasybalus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their passime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselues Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For, being made Prator, and commanding their Armies against the Carthagi- 30 mians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselse so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warr. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pifistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of fixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his private enemics, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully; but intending thereby to affure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among 40 the Syracustans, grew from his accusation of the principal men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it vnder safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyrannie; being but fine and twentie yeares of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his defire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was 50 much good prouision, and under it the Gallies were mored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselse without all shame or seare: The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie fort within Syracuse, that could not thriue thriue by honest courses; and some neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his establishing the faction, raigning at that present, were wholly affected to his affistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, saue to assure what hee had alreadie. Hee strengthned himselfe by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Aristomache, the daughter of sinparinus, and sifter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse, which have vnto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, cre some of the Syracusians (enuying his prosperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes against him, even in the noveltie of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them suffect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all, that hee might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it instanded them with a desire to free themselves from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they sound friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ransaked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wise, that for the griese thereof shee positoned her selfe. But hee sollowed their hecles as pace; and firing a Gate of the Citic by night, entred soone chough to take revenge,

o pace; and firing a Gate of the Citic by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedie riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowner, no, not of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people, that euer raigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectively cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay 30 before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie hee recouered his Citadell: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, hee againe recovered the masterie over the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their Harnest, hedifarmed all the Townes-men remayning: and new strengthned the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threescore thousand labourers, hee finished in three weekes; being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortic thousand Targets, with as many 40 fwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corflets, and all other sutable armes. Which done, he fent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sicil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answere, he tooke the spoile of all the Phanician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and fine hundred thips of burden. Most of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; sauing Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyra, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wonne Motya 30 by affault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta hee lost a great part of his Armie, by a sallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himileo arrives; but, ere he tookeland, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fittie ships of warre, and fine thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwith sanding, hee recoursed againe Motya vpon his sirst descent. From thence marching towards Mesonered sena, he tooke Lypara, and (soone after) Messena, and rased it to the ground. Now beganne Diony/im greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territoric of the Leontines, by which hee supposed that Himileo would passe toward Syracuse; and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with source and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himileo had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halte ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sca: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Ma-go. But Leptines was veterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly nish fiue hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracule arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to beliege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fittle faile of ships, and threescore and fine Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it of all that could beare armes, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not fo; neither indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysus postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himileo followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aide from the Lacedamonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make pro-

uision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and finke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the

Tyrant exceeding ill; having also at the present weapons in their hands; they confult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; asit is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having flaine great numbers of them, forceth Himileo to desire peace. This peace Dionysius fold him for a great summe of monie; on condition that he should seale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him : for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended them-hardly forbeare to deliuer vnto memorie the like practifes, when they meete with their matches : That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very sutable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himileo. I was present, when De Piles related the injurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. John d' Angelie, to the French

King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. Hee rendred it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armic, of the Queene Mother, and of divers Dukes and Mar-and forced to faue his life by flight, leaving the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with enfignes di-

Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them. Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Mellena. Mago. who staied in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of sourcescore thousand Souldiers is fent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monic, and make peace with Dionysius, Icauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for them-Clues: whom Dionylius, after a long fiege, ouer-came, and gave their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourescore thousand crownes. to furnish him with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for affurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearely bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might befrege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the ende hee might not, without some colour, fallifie the faith that hee had given to them; he pretended to want victual for his Armie, at fuch time as hee seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him the rewith; promifing to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming 20 home to Syracuse.

Hisrefolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, hee would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he defired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a fiege any long time against him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his raigne, he defired them to bestow adaughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doerather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words.

30 Alexander the Great forgaue many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errours. And certainely, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publique.

It is faid, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that hee vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sanoyan: for he had pardoned tenne thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their fwords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir John Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait 40 letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and rafing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter hee flue Mago, with ten thousand Africans : so the sonne of Mago beat him, and 50 flue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperitie and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doc. When

When he had raigned eight and thirtie yeeres, he died : some say, in his bedde. peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise, A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plate a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to have him flaine, or fold for a flaue. For he could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore filed his crucitie, The hate of enil men. and his lawleffe flaughters, The ornaments and effects of his inflice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doc: and I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Sauiour Christ Hath told vs, The World willloue

To this Dionysius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, he pardoned, and relealed out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, hee remitted vnto his Citizens diners payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that hee had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Sheepes skinne, and put on that of the Woolfe. For being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath beene said) had two Wines: 20 Doris of Locris; and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-inlaw of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris hee had this Dieny sius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrofine. he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe brother, Dienysius; the yonger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides : after whose death, Dien tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a just, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly given over to sensualitie, prevailed so much with Plate, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct 30 the youg King. And having perswaded the King to entertaine him, hee wrought fo well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the love of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrifons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seucritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius flood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftic Gal- 40 lies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that al the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, then to foften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time having furnished fiftic Gallies, under colour of the Kings service, had it in his ownepower, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serue the King with fo great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For 50 they that had served the King for none other ende, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been eraised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to con-

ceine itaright. But these couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to ftile his Lone and Liberalitie; Pride and Presumption; and heartned the yong King, in his oppressing, and eating vo his owne people, of whose spoiles they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando cortele, one of the brauest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the fiege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the west Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himselfe about him; and to 10 haue it faid, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

CHAP.I.S.4. †.4. of the Historie of the World.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to fend him thereuenewes of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his own pleasure: not without giving hope, to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would have beene well pleased to line well, as he did, at Athens. But after sometime, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mansgoods; and thereby vrged him to take another course; euento seeke therestitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and 20 hated of the Tyrant: bur it flood him in good flead, when he fought to raile men, with whose helpe he might returne into Sieil. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for hee caried the matter closely) to follow him in this adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily affist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil; marched to Syracufe; entred the Citie without relistance: armed the multitude; and wonne all, saue the Citadell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie; but hee quickely had advertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracufe: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne. 30 he was faine to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollogrates, his eldest sonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to affift him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receive him with greatioy. Soone after his departure from Syracule, new troups enter the Castle: they sallie out, affaile, spoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towne fmen, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next 40 night they of the Castile sallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Countrie surmounting all the injuries that he had received. Hee fets vpon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, eucry-where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well-necre burnt to alhes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recoursed the Cafile, with the munition and furniture thereof, and fent Apollocrates, after Dionyfius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best descrued, and whom he had loued most, gaucan vntimely ende to his dayes. For he was soone after this 50 his victorie, murdered by Calyppus; who, after he had, with ill successe, a while gouerned Syracuse, was flaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered

found Gouernour therein. The better fort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his crueltie, flee to Icetes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their affiliance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracustans, being deferningly afflicted on all fides, lend to the Corinthians for fuccour. Icetes also lends thither, and diffwades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armic in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, to more inraged then diffwaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliver syracisse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where hee besieged Icetes, being himselse a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to pertwade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if 20 he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselse ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open affembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in private; that he might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Cartbaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtayned by a sew faire words, was without loffe, and farre more casie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons defire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and having set faile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, 30 where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, were surplising Icetes his Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Advantansionned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyfius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld up himfelf, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timeleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arrivall, had recouered the Castle of Syracufe, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For 40 he belieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timolcon.

The Corinthians fend vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by soule weather. Icetes is strengthned with threescore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armic, Icetes affaulteth the Cassle. Timoleon sends them victualls, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore resolue to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards 50 it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheti, towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he banged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citic when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the graffe, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for peopleto re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme ariseth. As drubal and Amilear, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilybeum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouitions) in a thouland thips of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vport the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slain; five thoufand taken; with all their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found athonfand corflets, gilt, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an overthrowe to Icetes, and following his victoric, tooke him, with his sonne Eupolemus, and the Ge- Plut, in vit. Time nerall of his horse, prisoners, whom he caused all to be slaine; and afterwards (which 20 was imputed to him for great crueltie)he suffered Icetes his wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a yong child of his, with Arestomache his fifter to to be cast into the Sea.

CHAP.I.S.4.† 4.

He againe prevailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it felfe. Mamereus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Meffena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, wonne the towne deliucring Hippon, to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamereus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should nor passe the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syra-30 custans, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for euer ordained to bee kept holy a-

After fuch time, as Timoleon had delivered Syracule, from the tyrannie of Dionrfins, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the inhabitants enjoyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in fafetie; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

49 Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there started up an Agathacles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and fo from degree to degree; riling to bee a Prator; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syraoufians. Many fortunes he ranne, and under-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie, For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was imploied as also for the Syracustans, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable feruice: and on the contrarie, as memorable feruice for the Murgantines, against the Sy-

30 racusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he fackt Leontium; and belieged Syracuse so streightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aide, even from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilear was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought fo well, that he got him to make peace betweene him Telfe and the Syracustans; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for cuer after. Amilear entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the affiltance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie being also divided into many factions) he aifailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and gives libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appc- 10 tites, and firewed the firects with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to deathocles, in an affembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly confumed, he found no better, than the violet remedies, which he had administred; & that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient & indifferent Democratie, by which it had been gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to have the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) per- 20 force. For as hee knew, that hee had left none living, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had affifted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, then the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King; againe and againe, faluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-weale; the other fought only to succeede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the o- 30 ther, after he had obtayned the Crowne, fought, by making of good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by tuftine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the fumme whereofisthis. The fame Amilear that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the maffacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilear, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicil into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Citics, confe- 40 derate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (fo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere fallhood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreffe. Embassadours were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathoeles in minde of his couenants; Amilear was recalled home into Africke, and a new Captaine appointed to succeede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agethoclestoreason, if otherwise he would not barken to it. All this tended, to save their Confederates from suffering such initiries in the future. For that which was past (lineait could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it severely punished. Amilear was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being given, 50 bup not calculated; and so reserved, yntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilear had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agatheries, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusian, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authoritie, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cutiome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices: thinking to deale fubtilly, and finely, they spinne their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilear faw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices; which if he could not doe, it was to be expected that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which fome of his fore-10 goers had taught him; and, for feare of fuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what fort he thought best. This desperation of Amilear served to informe Azathoeles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resoluted to get the start of them in action. Hedissembled no longer; but, in stead of spoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Steel his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to have encountred an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and give them sharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was fo Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their 20 businesse vindone, and returne into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, cuen whilest it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilear, the sonne of Gifco, gathering together the remainders of this ship-wrack, was bold to passe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathoeles was foone readic to examine the cause of their comming. Many skirmishes passed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracustan had the better. But his good successe begat presumption: whereby he lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerse chance is enough to ouerthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not up-held by great 30 circumspection. The warre was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracufe, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the most part) such, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchifed flaues, or base and needie people; helpers in establishing the present Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and spoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obferued, and (withall) fo fearfull, that they durft not stirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie; Famine 40 was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessitie, Agathocles adventured vpon a strange course, which the event commended, as wife. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the belieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathoeles was readie to depart, aduertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neere 50 vnto spracufe. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise faile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agatheeles, issuing forth of the Bort, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the

Citic, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would give them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieued by their comming, for that Agathacles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceived; first, that by pursuing two sleets at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agathacles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were sled, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to doe mischiese in

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathoeles (whether by chance, or by relation 10 of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (atthe first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselues, in seeking their owne missortune. For he sought with them, and beat them; and, having sunke, or taken many, draue the rest to sie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathoeles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (said hee) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceive that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they levie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if wee offer greater wages than they can giue: which wee may better promife and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus hee talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two, to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; 30 which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilear is broken, and his whole Armie destroid in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had seaped in the late Sea sight, yet still they seare, and know not what. They suspect

Amilears faith, who had suffered Agathoeles to land in Africk: they suffect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemie; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commitit.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomil- 40 car; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldome happens, that dissension betweene Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessitie drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made casie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilear would not ftirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian societie, to take part with Agathoeles: who pursuing his victorie, wins many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians 50 also send into Sicil, willing Amilear, their Generall, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whiles hee was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilear sends them sine thousand ment all his sorces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathoeles back into Sicil, than to be drawne home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a badissue: He spent some time in winning a sew Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracustans: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a studen hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a pretie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilear had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His sancie begot this dreame, and he believed it. He made more haste, than good speede, toward the Citie: and comming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was to carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agribales.

fent) to Agathocles. This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocies was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promiles to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he faid) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophedas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murder this his affiftant; 20 and afterwards, by good words, and great promifes, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanic found good successe; and he so prenailed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had imbraced a defire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had fo long beene exposed, (asareward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had prevailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Azathoeles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sieil he returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a bat-20 taile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to help himselse: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agatheeles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promiles of great bootic and spoile. It had now been time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) have given to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene diffressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himfelfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loffe of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the flrange events following it. The Cartha-40 ginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old facrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the good lieft of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the faid Idoll, in way of thankefulnesse for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappiemen were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings necrest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is viuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of sire burnt vp the Pauilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleeuing, that the noise in the aduerse Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to inuade it.

50 Butthe Carthaginians had a fafe retrait: agathoeles, by a fecond errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee beganne to affaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost, in this blinde fight, aboue fourethousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, heeknew no more how to moderate his present weake searcs. than lately he had known chow to gouerne his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely abourd his ships, with his yonger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flic into Sicil; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessells wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift. arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loofe, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sonnes behinde him. His to flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his seare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, deprining him of the succours which reason offered, the sequele doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for ninetcene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, having lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being delivered from forraine enemies, discovered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his teares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected : but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein striuing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasse, that should serve to scortch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischieses he was so outragious, that he neither spared 20 Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his estate : it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into fuch feare, that hee was faine to feeke the loue at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phanicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and filuer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebells, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, hee made a voiage into Italie. There hee 40 fubdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they veelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great fumme, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be gods, that had continually given deafe earcs to his horrible perjuries? Then hee returned richly home, with eleven thips loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were castaway by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselse

ted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest

he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that hee had taken out of Agypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Achagathus, be-forementioned, and a yonger some of his owne, beganne to contend about the escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grienous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rot- 50

Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life; wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Vnole, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome without asking any leave. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathbacles with seare and forrow. He saw himselse without helpe, like to become a prey to his yngracious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no sauour was to be expected, either by himselse, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to flie before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, eito ther death, or somewhat that would be worse. Hee gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speede into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselse into the sire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he sirst beganne it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiteroully occupied Messand insessed a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished.

20 For the Sicilians were driven to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champaine field, wherein Rome and Carthage should sight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our Storie will declare.

Hen Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his victoric gotten at Messara, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syraeuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron sound it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselse by what meanes he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without reare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were sighting for the masterie. In this good moode, the new Roman Consults, M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vie of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consulls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else inested, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracustan held them busied (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of service) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into maniscst perill of subversion, for their sakes, that should have received all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without strayning themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathecles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more flack, in sending helpe : if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire. that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken onethe other, whereby their owne worke might be the casier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into flauerie: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathoeles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured. folong as he might preserve his ownetyranie: the later, as a just and good Prince. had no greater defire than to winne the loue of his people, by feeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that hee enjoyed a long and happic raigne; living deare to his owne Subjects, beloved of the Romans. and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration. That they had left him to him felfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it, 20

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall.

IERON, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming upon his 30 assignment was a goodly Citic, builty year. The Carthaginians inde it bigh time to bestire them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arrived, der conduct of they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the feat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The compasse was ten miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it The Roman Consults, having made eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citie, by reason of the fer-tilite of the soile, and the neighbourhood of Carbage, grew in a short and, in their places, Lucius Posthumius, space from snall beginnings, to great glorie and riches. The plantie and in their places, Lucius Posthumius, luxuric thereof was fo great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the A- and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They goe grigenines built Palaces of fuch sumptuositie, as if they meant to line for on towards * Agrigentum: and finding 40 euer: and made such feasts, as if they meant to die the next day. But euer; and made such seasts, as if they meant to die the next day. But the such that they besiege it, and Theaters, Water-conduits, and Fish-ponds: the ruines whereof at though it were stuffed with fiftie thouthis day are sufficient argument, that Rome it selse could neuer boak of the they besiege it, and Theaters to the Temple of supier of supplies, which we fand Souldiers. After a while, the time may judge of the Temple it selse; there was set out on one side the sulf of haruest being come, a part of the Roproportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polithed marble of diuers colours; a worke the most magnificent and rare, that man armie range the Country to gather cuer hath beene seene; on the other side, the warre of Troy, and the en-corne, and those at the siege grow neglicounters which hapned at that fiege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doets in that warre; all of the like beautifull stone, and of equall stature to the bodies of men in those ancient times: In com- and indanger the Roman Armie, but are parison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but pettie things, in the end repelled into the towne with and meete trifles. It would require a volume, to expresse the magnification to the Tomples of Hercules, Edulapus, Concord, 1uno Lacinia, Cha-great losse; but by the smart felton both 50 fisite, Proferpina, scaffer and Pollux, wherein the Master-peeces of those sides, the Assailants redoubled their caquific Painters, and Caruers, Phildis, Zeusis, Myon, and Polycle-guards, & the besseged kept within their tus, were to be seen. But in processe of time it ranne the same fortune guards, & the besseged kept within their that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by dures calamic couert. Yetthe Romans, the better to astus of warre: whereof this warre present brought vnto it not the least. sure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe; and another on the out-fide thereof that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter fuddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the belieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilest the Siracustan supplies the affailants with what they went. The beileged fend for succour to Carthage: after they had beene in this fort pent up five moneths. The Carthagmians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heracles, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfeinto the field, and surpriseth Erbesius, a Citie wherein the Ro-10 mans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no leffe streightly affreged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: infomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this diffresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to give them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, hee makes approch vnto the Romin campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horfe-men to charge their Vantguard, to the ende to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. 20 The Numidians performe is accordingly; and while the Romans purfued the Numidians, Hanno gives vpon them, and having flaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches. After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, burlay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some oportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was belieged in Agrigentum, as well by fignes as melfengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke fuch dilatoric courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consults to fight; But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day; and with such as escaped, he recoursed Heraclea, Annibal 30 perceiuing this, and remayning hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without relistance. The Confulls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: fure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposehenceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, only 40 but now they determine, to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the winde of good successe, to faile over into Africke. Itisthe discase of Kings, of States, and of private men, to court the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which wee neither have nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee have alreadic. This curse vpon mortall men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts:

To profecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Offacilius, two new Confuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gave themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to fecure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equal themselves in every kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-crast, a storme of winde thrust

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to fet vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fine on enery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-fands many feates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the fand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, to C. Cornelins, one of the new Consuls (for they changed enery yere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kind of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messena with scuenteene Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row alongst the cost to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of service. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arrivall, sent foorth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Confull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Confull; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. For hee, fancying to him- 20 selse to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; sought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not eafily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aducrtifed of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius, Duilius, confidering that the Roman veffels were heavie and flow, the African Gallies having the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby 30 they might fasten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as we callit) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft ; the Vessells, wherin both Nations fought, being open: so that al was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by reafon of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may bee given betweene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainly, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: hee must beleeue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loofe or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroße, loft at the Azores, when hee fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like fort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the yeare 1588. if he had not beene better aduifed, than a great many malignant fooles were, that 50 found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging, so that, had he intangled himselfe with thosegreat and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwife, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, hee had not beene worthie to have held his head. Hecre to speake in generall of Scafight (for particulars are fitter for private hands, then for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twenty ships, all good failers, and good ships, hauethe advantage, on the open Sca, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred faile keepe themselues neere together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie thips, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall 10 back vpon their next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable, or loft. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which give themselues scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and flaying, they may give them the other; and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred faile give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of ouer-failing their fellowes keepe the winde : and if vpon a Leeshore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their own squadron. 20 then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe.

That fuch advantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath been wel enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, Thucidal. 6. which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be obserued.

CHAP.I. $.7.

Of the Art of Warre by Sca, I had written a Treatife, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient ormoderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the loffe of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will 30 therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leves loquuntur, ingen-

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians who by looling their aduantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other fide, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertieto saile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

d. VII.

Diversenter feats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

He victorie of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was ever seene in that Citie; so gave it vinto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea ; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilear the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune : and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them ynawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but cscaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtayned the trust of a new fleet, wherewith hee arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crofting the Seas from Sicil, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They fet vpon him unawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping their danger. But 10 it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voiage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence : for (as it hath beene said of old) Non est bis in belopeecare : In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till "If wee may panern:us was belieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of which Fazellus, the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine adiligent wri-

The numbers, with which each of them filled their to draw it: the fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his madriremes had foure to chimation, there were in the Romane Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; an Oare: and and in those of Caribage, an hundred and fifty thousand : reckoning one hundred the Telerans, and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to every Gallie, one with the 50 three. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came up the fourth, in forme of a Crefeent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: fo that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceive by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and firetched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en hiji; a long front of horse, and thinne; which torme, since the Pistoll to prevailed ouer the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-stretched front. their Battalions were more folide: for Amilear, Admirall of the Cathaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans hasted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victorie) disorder themselves, and, for eagernesse of taking the Runn awaies, leave their other three foundrons farre behinde them. For fo it must needes fall out; feeing that the third foundron towed their horse-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearcward of all. According to Amilears direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Circhaginian first fleet, which ran 20 away they forthwith gaue after them with all speeds possible, not so much as looking behinde them for the tecond squadron. Hereby the komans were drawne neare vito the bodie of the Casthaginian fleet, led by Amilear, and by him (at the first) received great losse tul their second squadron came vp, which forced Amilear to betake him to itts Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, invaded the Koman Reareward, and prevailed against them. But Amicar being beaten off, Mureus A dans fell backe to their succour, and put the Carthazinians to their heeles; as not able to fullaine both squadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Consuliscame to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed their victualers, which was alto in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: 30 but the Confulls, joyning their squadrons to it, but the Carthaginians on that part alfo to running. I his victorie fell to the Romans, partly by the hardinesse of their

Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilear, being first beaten, could neuer after joyne himselfe to any of his other 'quadrons, that remained as yet in faire likelihood of prevailing, to long as they fought vpon even termes, and but fquadron to fquadron. But Amilear, forfaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman fleet vningaged, and readie to give fuccour to any of the other parts that were opprest. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they loft but foure and twentie of theirs, whereas the africans loft thirtie that were funk, and threefcore and three that were taken.

40 Now, if Amilear, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while hee himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had beene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilear was opprest; and Amilear, being opprest and feattered, the Confuls had good leifure to relieue both their third and fourth squadron and got the victorie.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the second his sonne, where he aduiseth him concerning Warre against the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes 50 betweene them and the Christians, he should never faile to charge the Ianifars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the rell. For (faith he) the lanifars, who are alwaics reserved intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke reposeth his greatest confidence; come vp in a grosse body, when all the troups, on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carie the victoric before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romansalso prevaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triari in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious advantage it hath euer beene found, to keepe some one or two good troupes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

d. VIII.

The Romans prenaile in Africk. ATILIVS the Consult propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is otterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Ow the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived by at the Promontorie of Hereales, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilear himselfeas yet said. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they dis- 20 imbarked, and prepared to beliege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa fide; without which all inualions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts: both by Sca and Land, for their defence. The Romans fend to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order given from the Senate, was, that one of the Confulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Conful is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand 30 African captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fifteene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus casily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the River of Bagrada, * This Citie he encountred with a Scrpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he flue, was takenfrom not without losse of many Souldiers, being driven to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adu he met with the in the yeere Carthaginian Armic, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bollar, together with 1536. and was Amilear, who had brought ouer out of Sieil fine thousand foot, and fine hundred 40 horse to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him which he gaue out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to undergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themselves free from necessitie of comming to cond his fonne blowes: yet had they a great defire, to faue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Into keepe fafe; tending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the to wit, this 111nis, the Key of siege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the Africa: Flush- top of an hill: but thereby they loose the services, both of their Elephants, and of ing, the Key of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vie of it. and cadiz, the He affailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while; but in fine the Ro-Key of Spaine. mans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Fol- 50 the Philip to lowing this their good for tune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis a Citie withloft, that hee in fixteene miles of Carthage, which they affault and take.

them againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to pick any locke, but brake open the dores, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the loffe of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the loffe of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, infult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territory. and force those that inhabite abroad, to for sake their villages and fields, and to hide themselues within the walls of Carthage. . By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne advantage, and affures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out yet he feared lest it might defend it selfe, untill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Confulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition thereto fore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdainefull, that they resolved, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly fent to entertaine. Among these was avery expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians received neere vnto Adis. gaue it out publiquely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate : Xantippus 20 is fent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led .confifted of no more than twelue thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wher with the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wines, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbred; the one confisting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which vie the service of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Ro-30 mans; and ranging his troups upon faire and levell ground, fittelt both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a fordorne hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the lesse subject vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vnto 40 the violence of horse, wherein the enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at area sonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beafts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neverthelesse persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, Jo beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse: who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire; but had much adoe to make good the ground whereon they flood. In the meane while, fuch of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and

good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disordred Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared; to baue dealt with the enemie voon equali termes. Here was therefore a greater flaughter with little light; the Romans haltily recoiling to the bodie of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the descat of these troups, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a fuil victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armic, sauetwo thousand, and taking fine hundred prisoners, together with Attlius the Consull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercinaries, which were flaine, when the fight began. by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about, to avoide the Elephants, bare 10 downe all before them, and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armic behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no leffe her vaffalls, than were the Carthaginians: how infolent socuer they had beene in their proposition of peace; as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she never gave nor fold to any mortall man. With what toy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, wee may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue. no leffe then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVRYPI- 20 DES, Mens una sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wife minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuied then honoured, or for what other cause it is

The death of Atilius Regulus the Confull, was very memorable. Hee was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne it the buincesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainely faw that his Countrie should loose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he carnelly 30 perswaded to have the prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, hee returned to Carthigs: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians sceme to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would harken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perferue himselse and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. What soeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; fure it is, that his faithfull observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange 40 of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vaine-glorious frowardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made foone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnific him in this point; we are to confider that they lived vnder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Cuth igiman, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he fuffered with extreme torments, could not be more greeuous to him than it was dilhonourable to Caribage. Neither doe I think that the Carthaginians could excufe themselves herein; otherwise than by rectimination: saying, That the somans deferued to be no better intreated for as much as it was their ordinary practice 50 to vie others in the like fort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Roman fashon, to whip almost todeath, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made laire warres with them. Whereforeit feemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall infolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace bath beene denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approuing the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away. 10 In the yeare 1278, the Genowaies wonne fo fast upon the Tenetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it felfe. This bred fuch an amazement in the Citizens of Ven nice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their flate referued) what socuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken to no composition; saue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and affaile Doria with such desperate surie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himselfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Padoa, and foure thousand prisoners; recouer Chiozza, and all the places taken 20 from them; and following their victoric, enter the Port of Genos, enforcing the Ge-nowaies, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disaduantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the veere 1280. when having taken a notable, and withall an over-cruell revenge youn the Gantois. he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citic, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnaduisedly refused, and was resoluted to extinguish them vtterly: they issue out of their Citie with fine thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) 30 with his vanguished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of fraw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and faued himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATILIVS: How the Romans having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to for sake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations divided by the Sea.

CHAP.I. S.9.

Y the reputation of this late victory, all places that had beene lost in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Chipea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Atilius with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a groffe Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fuluius, their Confulls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene befleged : and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recour all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent flormes; which ever hapned between othe riling of Orion, and of the * Dogflarre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleete had thus fore-warned and the other, was extreme dishonourable.

them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of nationatione certaine times Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to faue themselves vpon such an accident; yet this weather besides their accidentall stormes. We have venous coast a Michaelmas staw, that feldome or neuer failes: In the west tradies, in the moneths of Angust and that they were able to conquer the Elements september, those most forcible winds, which the Spaniard call the Nortes, or Northwinds, are very feareful; victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winde ands call the Nortes, or Northwinds, are very fearefull:
and therefore they that Nauigate in those parts, take harbor till those months take end, Charles the six being Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their repunarbor till mole months take eine coanta to the bank of the state of t before Mergin Loraine, loft an hundred and fortie ships coast. The mercilesse windes in the means while by tempest, and siteene Gallies, with all in essential to the means while by tempest, and siteene Gallies, with all in essential to the means while by tempest, and siteene Gallies, with all in essential to the means while because the means while by tempest, and litteene Gallies, with an in effect in them of men, victualles, horses, and munition: a losse on ouertake them, and necre vnto Camerina, ouerturne them or men, victualies, usines, and through the one and through headlong on the rocks, all but four cfcore leffe great, than his retrait, both from before the one and through headlong on the rocks, all but four cfcore of three hundred and fortie ships: so as their former great victorie was deuoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recoursed Rome. The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Veffells, hobing once agains to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land- 20 forces (ince the overthrow of Atilius. They fend Afdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortic Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armic and fleet he arrives at Lilybaum; where hee beginnes to vexe the Partifans of Rome. But aduerlitic doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and furround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consulls. But these wrought no won- 30 ders. Some spoile they made upon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to have perished, neere vnto the lesser syrtes, where they were faine to heave all over-boord, that so they might get off: then, having with much a-doe doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fistie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they loft in fight, foure hundred & fixe ships and Gallies, with all the munition and 40 Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to give over their Nauigation, and their fight by Sca, and to fend only a Land armie into Sicil, vnder L. Cacilius, and F. Furins, their Consulls. These they transported in some threescore ordinarie passage-boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not about a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like fort, the ouerthrow which Atilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late resolution of for saking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for 50 them to succour those places which they held in Sieil, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messanto Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Si-, sil, making fometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it. in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies; in eight and fortie houres.

CHAP. 1. S.9.

An old example we have of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the West, landed in Dorfet-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Severne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-10 fbire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where hee pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the 2V etherlands have had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwcaried. andentire, with all the Munition and Artileric belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemics have been eable to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: 20 making countenance either to beliege Boifledue, or Gertreuiden Berg; which the enemic (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde ferued, he fuddenly fet faile, and arriving in the mouth of the Menze, turned vpthe Rhine, and thence to Yssel, and sate downe before Zurphen. So before the Spaniar de could march ouer land round about Holland, aboue fourescore mile, and ouer many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armic had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to faile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulft in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. 30 So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish armic could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no fooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulft, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citic of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to fay the trut's; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfcagainst a powerfull enemic, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should bee an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolued to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Intonio, King of Portug ila before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would have kept off the En-40 glub, by power of his land-forces; as being too weake at Sea, through the great onerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeere foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armic, that should be able to resist our eleventhousand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it have been easie vnto the English, to take, ransack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leavie of eight thousand, under the Earle of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sr Iohn Norris, and his Associates: 30 considering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them over all the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of private adventurers, had thus

begunne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Partugale, and make hafte to the defence of their St. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armic. into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to bee readily and joyfully welcomed : could they have hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, lixe daies iournie? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the River of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, having wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let 10 vs consider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by advantage of a fleer, if wee had none. This que-Rion. Whether an inuading Armie may be refifted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleete of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is alreadic handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Casars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition: in ablence of our shipping: and comparatively; as, that it is a more fafe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemie to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemie from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if wee faile, then must wee seeke to make him 20 wish, that he had staicd at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positive, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable foto doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victorie to an enemic, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monlue, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Coun. 30 trie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, jeuse bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire [es Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrarie side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemie, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when hee inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, betweene such a Countrie as France is, strengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inualions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entran-40 ces cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armic to be transported over Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeachit; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot; and that those twelve thousand be laid in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nelle, and fixe thousand at Foulkflon, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these 50 troups (vnleffe some other order be thought more fit) bee directed to firengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it : I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemie, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Neffe, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twentie and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neffe. Nay, how shall they at Fonlkson bee able to doe it, who are necret by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemie, at his first arrivall, will eyther make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thoufand, that were intrenched at the Nelle, to runne; or elfe give them fo much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulk son; and perhaps to Margat: where-10 by those places will bee left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelue thousand Kentifo Souldiers arrive at the Neffe, cre the enemic can be ready to disimbarque his Armie, so that hee shall finde it vnsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleeue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing liberty to goe which way he lift) vnder couert of the night, fet fayle towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, eyther at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Year the like may bee fayd of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily 20 out-runne the Souldiers that couft them Les Armees ne volent poynt en poste; Armiesneyther flye, norrunne post, sayth a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe dayes. Againe, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores. shall be forced to runne from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length fit downe in the mid-way, and leave all at adventure. But fay it were otherwise; That the inuading enemie will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours readie to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders 30 and Capraines, shalbe drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.)

to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie likevnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The He of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthned by art: it being euery where hard of accesse; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon enery cone or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approch of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur 1582.

40 de Chattes, that held it to the vie of Don Antonio, with fine or fixe thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therin; the Marquesse having shewed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did set saile, ereany was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre diftant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroßie, flaine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would bee perswaded to 50 make fuch diligent haste, from Margatto the Nesse, and backe againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera;

whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble ships of Spaine. This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England,

Hhhhh

France,

France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a flect of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those Engish in Fayal, my selte, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited. with omiffion of my name; I may by a civill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeed some which were in that voiage, who adulfed me not to vidertake it: 18 and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they defired mee, to referue the title of fuch an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to inuade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would have taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince & Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think 20 any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vn willing, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne fquadron, whose affistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would have bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therfore I tooke with me none, but men affured, Comanders of mine own squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refule; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harucy, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir Iohn Skot, Sir Thomas Redgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton. Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnder- 20 stood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I undertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the sleepenesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (not withstanding) made fine or fixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wal, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great loffe. This I could have done with leffe danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example : but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen about named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and 40 take the shorter course; having it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemie was more then a Coward; (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of service, by feeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise have dealt with But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemic troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his advantage; that many of our men were slayne or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when we had wonne good footing) would needes 50 follow vs to the Town were driven by him, to for sake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselves to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression. I hope that this question shall never come to triall; his Majestics many moucable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdaine, than any Nation under heauen can doe, to be beaten von their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemie; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they cate of our Kentifb Capons, I take it to be the wifest way. To doe which, his Maiestie, after God, will imploy his good thips on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment voon the shore.

How the Romans attempt agains to get the mastrie of the Seas. The victorie of CEA. CILIVS the Roman Consull at Panormus: The siege of Lilybaum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybaum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to flop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous loffes received, under CLAVDIVS and IVNIVS their Confulls, abandon the Seas againe.

Hen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether imposlible, either to keepe what they had alreadie gotten in Sieil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resoluted once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwarke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leffe daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Confulls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cacilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Pa-20 normus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybaum towards it, hoping to pronoke Cacilius to fight. But the Confull was better aduised. For when Adrubalhad made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cacilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, agood distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattailea Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should advance themselves, and passe over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those bealts he commanded them to retire, by flow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no meanes passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a fland, they 40 were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpontheir owne foot men, and vtterly disorderedthem. Cacilius, espying this advantage, sallied with all the force hee had; and charging the other troups, that flood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great flaughter of them, and taking al their Elephants.

The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred faile, which they fent into Sicil, to give end to that warre, that had now lasted four eteene yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolue to attempt Lilybaum, the only place of importance which 50 the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neere adjoyning. They set downe before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of adnantage neere vnto it, especially of such as comand the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence, & by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the city, as the defendants begin to despaire.

Yet Himileo, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligences he maketh many furious fallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could bee made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agrigentum. Himileo yfeth the helpe of Alexon, to affure the hired Souldiers; and imployeth Hannibal to appeare the troups of the Gaules, which did waver, and had fent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vn- 10 able to performe what they had undertaken, are faine to live in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, having Hannibal the sonne of Amilear, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all relistance, entred the Port and Citic, to the incredible joy of the belieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himileo with hope of great reward) resolute to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the fiege, or (at leaft) to take from them, or fet on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, 20 and having the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilyheum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian undertakes the service; and having received his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to £gusa, a little Iland neere Lilyheum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port,

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to 36 be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he fet faile, and finpping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, sinding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, is any one durst come forth, to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkeable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre-off, the adventure which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and indicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the 40 best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatned to sinke their ships if they came through the streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maieslies, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduenture; and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But 50 the Minion, commanded (as Itake it) by William Eurrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that sollowed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma besieging Antwerp; and sinding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise then by samine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne up by any winde of glorie, but comming to sinde agood market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelve Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of should avoured them; as also with a contrarie to winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as he was forced, in the ende, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvailous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when we ented the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from fixe in the morning till twellue at noone. The fiege of Oftend, and of many other places, may be given for proofe, how hard a matter it is to flop the paffage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tereera, that there is no passage along beso so fide it, or that the ships are driven to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and searcfull:

CHAP. I. S. 10.

But to returne to our adventurous Rhodian: Hee arrives in safetic at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybeum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romant therfore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe inpart: but they grounded so many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the passes. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspected in the passes of the course should be successed in the same taken. Now comes the brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallic, a little before taken, gave him chace, and gathered vponhim; he findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her resolved to sight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lily beum, after this, is greatly distressed in the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybeum, were so ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne unto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistle steen the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolue, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had paft, a supply often thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Gonsull. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybeum: where having re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a Citie on the other 30 side of the Bay of Lilybeum. This service the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarques his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approch; but having recovered his spirits, shee per-Hhh h h 3 swades fwades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleete. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consult, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his advantage, and forceth the Confull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, having the land on his back: how ping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sca-roome, so streightned, as hee could not turne himselfeany way to from his enemies, nor range himfelfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleete, to the number of ninetic and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indifcretion and flight, as much differed at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threescore Gallies, with which they fend away L. Iunius, their Confull, to take charge of their businessein Sicil. Iunius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaum. One hundred and 20 twentie Gallies he had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred thips of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie prouisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of faile, to keepe companie with him along from Messana. In the meane time, hee dispatcheth away to wards Lilybaum, his Quaftors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfeof his victuallers, with some Gallies for their convov.

Abherbal was not carcleffe, after his late victoric : but studied how to vse it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten 39 more under his owne charge; and fent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybaum. According to this direction, Caribals fuddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Romans, more attentiue to the keeping in of the belieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boords and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himileo, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who fallies out at the fame time. and putting the Romans in great distresse, gives Carthalo good leifure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, deuising how 40 to worke mischiefe to the enemie: wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, necre at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the victuallers, which the Confull Junius, more hastily than providently, had fent before him towards Lilybaum, Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for hee and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to feeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their partie; that could helpe to faue them only from the prefent danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that affailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride under those rocks, but would be forced, by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to faue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loffe of all their shipping. Whilest he was bussed in this care; the Consult Innius drew neere, and was discoucred. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether unprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither meanes to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemie. The Carthagmian, seeing this, betakes himfelfeto a Station betweene thet wo Roman fleets; where hee watcheth, to see which of them would first stirre, with a resolution to assault that, which 10 (hould first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carihaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for fo we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and never found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beafts, their Soothfayers being all land prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

20 This calamitie so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved agains to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the service of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Iland, against those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to Le excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertueof the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discaueries. Yet perfifting in their enterprises, with an innincible constancie, they have annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Provinces, as butie the remembrance

30 of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, have beene the enemies, wherewith enery one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeeres have passed over some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift undertakers, have not beene disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and

40 well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

). XI.

ð. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by A m I L C AR: who Southy holds warre with them five yeeres. The Romans having emptied their common treasurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of private men. The great victorie at Sen of LvcTATIVs the Confull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

HE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lily-beum, and seeke to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemics ships could not bring reliefe. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end hee resolued to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, hee got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making roads 20 into the Countrie. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were verie defencible) with a good firength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians fent forth Amilear, furnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a flect and armie, who failing to the coasts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroied the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infest the Romans, hee occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to 30 confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Ergs, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilear had seized upon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil hee held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeares abode hee did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemic could neuer bee drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a strange pecce of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on 40 the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuerthelesse Amilear found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which heeconueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middest of the ascent, ere the enemie knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilear himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent 50 vnto the profequating of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hanni-Lim Dec. 3.1.10. bal, in Livie, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage never stood in better mans had veterly for fakenthe Seas, partly by reason of their great losses, partly vpon confidence of their land forces, which they held reliftleffe; emilear, with a small Armie, had so well acquited himselfe, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fine yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not fuperiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been edeuted and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once agains to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastrie of the Sca could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilear, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The to common treasurie was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon private purses. Divers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, joyned with some others and laying their monie together, cocurred two or three of them, in building of anothers with condition to be repaied, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift-rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodien, in the Port of Lilybann, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was 20 committed to C. Luctatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeuouring by all meanes to have forced the Citic. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand; and being mindfull of the late loffes which his Predeceffours had received; he was care.

CHAP. 1. S. 11.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthie than himselfe. This qualitic procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking a-30 mong the ancient fort, whose cold temper is auerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-fight, confirmed by enery losse received. More particularly, hee was gracious among the people, for that hee was one of the most grieuous oppressours of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but there with all fuch hatred, as turned it al to their great loffe. Hee had ere this beene imployed against the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, hee learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loft not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counfaile, when, having shewed himselfe an 40 vnworthie Captaine, he betooke himfelfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preferue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his prefent voyage; wherein hereduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but hee had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of 30 Sea fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellowes. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough; to make the vnexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the reliftlesse force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either

conceived a-right, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to faile to Errx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading : and having thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboord some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilear himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enemic repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good course. if it could have beene performed. But Catulus vied all possible diligence, to preuent the execution of this designe: not because hee was informed of the enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that feared no dangerso greatly, as to encounter with Amilear. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was descried: 10 vet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to fuffer this convoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken aboord the choice men of the Roman Land souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter.

The state of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolue. Meanes to repaire their sleete in any time there were none lest; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilear, vpon whose valour and judgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where hee could not bee relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amilear himselse, and authorize him to take what cour se should seeme best vnto his excellent wisedome; leaving all conclusions were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, and seuentie taken, wherein were sew lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilear, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or talle, that 30 the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) resolved to make triall, whether his necessitiemight bee compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Luctatius the Consull an Ouerture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present pouertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with provision, T hat it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratific it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Isle of Sicil. Secondly, that they should never under-take upon Hieron King 40 of Syracus, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should fet at libertie, and send back into Italic, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ransome. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be delivered within twentie yeeres next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sieil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a 50 shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginian should not onely depart out of Sieil it selfe, but should also with draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweeneit and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick Warre; that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about sine hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warreit selfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polylius, That the Romans, in generall, did show themselves the braver Nation; and Amilear, the most worthie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

CHAP.2. S.I.

HE Romans, having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little llands thereunto adjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselues in a following warre, than cause to hold themselues contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Quò dieges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiantur à victis; That lawes Q. curi, L. are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answerthat was made vnto them, by one of the Privarnates; or else had forgotten to sollow it, in this waightie businesse. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the canse of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or affure themselves of of they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in 40 thefe words, Sibonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you give vs. it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answere, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was faid, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; an credi posse, vllum populum, aut hominem denig, in ea conditione, cuius eum paniteat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeedcany one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meere necessitie didenforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this judgement, of those Nations, who had little elfe, besides their manly resolution, to desend their libertie; furely, they grofly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, 30 who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themselues, would fit downe any longer by the loffe and dishonour received, than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the firength, which had a while failed them, to take renenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publique States, have more prevailed, than by any proper proweffe or vertue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended; Amilear, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybaum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiencie, he delivered over his charge. Gesco had an especiall consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercinaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wifest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that fo the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Com- 10 panies arrived. Herein hee dealt providently. For it had not beene hard to perfwade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require : so that the first might haue beene friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the second and third, whilest their designation had made them unableto recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by fuch an example, todraw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detayned the first and second commers; telling them, that they 20 would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was alreadic so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sieca: receiving every one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly 30 to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancie to their returning into the Townes and therefore compell them to truffe yn their fardells, that they might have none occasion left, to make any errands this ther. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arrivall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to doe, and therfore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their mony came in how much would fall to every single share; and for how long time the Citic was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could 40 finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passet away; vntill the whole Armie being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Harno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the daycome, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a a full resolution to help his 50 memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vnto them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the povertie of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of mony is to be paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessive charges, charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally defires them to hold themselues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his difcourse: for the Carthaginian Armic was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yetthey stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, fo that nothing would ferue to appeale them. Hanno would faine haue affwaged their 10 furie, but he knew not how: for hee leffe vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises. than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stire red vp to mutinic, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vie the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters missake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errandes in the worst sense, are best beleeved. Finally, they thinke themselues much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolue to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this moode they leave Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they

CHAP.2. S.I.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their one errour. It is a good rule, Curandum inprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat Fortibus & miseris.

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie Be not oppress with too great injurie.

But this proud citie, having neglected the rule, hath also beene carelesse in proui-30 ding to secure her selfe against the inconvenience that might followe. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto shee was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue beene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wines, children, and goods of these poore men, which had shee retained in shew of kindnesse, shee might have vsed them as Hostages, for her owne saferie; and by imploying a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, shee bath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best have served to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilear had no desire to be vsed as an instrumet indefrauding his owne fouldiours of their wages: epecially confidering, that as he o best could beare witnesse of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilear, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberall promises made by the Captaines. Amilear therefore did wifely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anon some of their Senatours 30 into the Campe, who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the souldiours understand, into what feare the City was driven; which cannot but adde much insolency to the passions alreadie stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

Armie, which thereupon growes wife, and finding the feafon fit, labours to make a great haruest. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique service of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had lived some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat: therefore what was this to the Caribaginians? Was it not all one, whether the thips did bring in prouision; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ferue. They faid that they had beene fometimes driven to buy; and that (fince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have beene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make none end of crauing. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this corne-monie; the Souldiers have deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater fumme of monie, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of these controuersies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choise of Gesco: partly out of good liking to him, who had 20 shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilear; for that he had not visited them in all this busic time. So Ge/co comes among them; and, to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren cloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanne. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then, the feuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; adusting them temperatly concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their love vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good services. After this he beganne to put 30 hand to his purse: offering to give them their whole paie in hand; and then after to consider of other recknonings, at a more convenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet passe; if two seditious ringleaders of the multitude had not flood against it.

There was in the Campeone Spendius, a sturdie fellowe, and audacious, but a flaue; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whom hee ferued, and therefore flood in feare, left he should be deliuered backe to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raifing fuch troubles as might ferue to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his owne resti- 40 tution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there affociated himselfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring up the tumult, as hee could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should bee made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (faith he) thefe our companions have no more to doe, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africa, Shall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; fo that we shall have cause to wish, that wee had returned home beggers, rather than loaden with 50 the monie, which (little though it be) shall breake our backes. Yee are not ignorant, how tyrannically thefe our haughtie Masters of CARTHAGE doe reigne over vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our lines and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times beene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their Sourreigntie: what will they now doe, feeing that we have demeaned our felues as free men, and beene bold to fet a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others have done? Ye all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs, if having beene as forward in cuerie danger of warre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and nut dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This not with standing yee may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to hadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countemance. Let vs therefore be wife; and confider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: unlesse wee now take 10 our time, and, whilest we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatlie, that their hatred shal not be able to doe us wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherewithall they have hired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they have neither monie nor friends. The best A mie that ever served them, whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gases, readie to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our fwords once drawne, all A FRICK would rife on our fide. As for the CART HAGI-NIANS, whither can they fend for belpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but we must quickely resolue. Either we must preuent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAVLES and SPANIAR DES, and procuring them to drawe bloud, or elfeit behoueth vs to please our goodmasters, by iogning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to jorgine wnto 20 them all our wages, it (o (peraduenture) they may be wonne to forgine vs, or not overcruelly topunish our faults already committed. Hee is worthily a wretched live, that neither hathcare to winne his Masters love, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such persuasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedie of monie, as of qurraell; which hee that seekes, will not mile to finde. When Geseo therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demandes; for horses and victualles to some other more convenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Autho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to adde more suell to the fire alreadie blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom'the souldiours will hearken: if any other stand up to make aspeech, a showre of stones, slying about his earcs, puts him to silence, that hee shall never afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said alreadie by these good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, saue onely

Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, under faire pretence of the com-40 mon cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himfelfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while hee workes with the seucrall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to give them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couctous as they seeme: but will be more glad of anill answere, then of a good payment. This is more then Gefco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath, any more then bare words, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as 50 rebuking their inconsiderate hear he telles them, That they may doc well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them & deride them? They flay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure thathe had brought; yea vpon him also, and al that are with him: as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that fo the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Matho follicites all Africk; and his Embassadours are cuerie where wellentertained. Neither is it needefull to vse perswasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians bee plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as she is euer assu- to red to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne shee vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne; that they doubled their tributes in al things elfe; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have fuffered so much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can bearearmes, are ready to doe service in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for maintenance of so iusta quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, 20 Matho and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threescore and tenne thoufand Africans : and are moreover furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begun, though it should be of long endurance.

Diners observations upon this warre with the mercinaries.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to vse helpe of mercinaries.

Ere let vs rest awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence wee may take prospect of the subject, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a 40 styrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne mercinaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessarie, that a tyrannie should bee vpheld by mercinarie forces: it is common that mercinaries should be false: and it is common, that all warre made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet wee seldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or fought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath beene prosecuted with fuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand. That which we properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subject, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely 50 forbeare to fay, that it is the vniust rule of one over many : for verie truely doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subjects, was none other than a meere tyranny; though it were fo, that they themselves were

were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needefull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: tince it may well and easily bee conceived, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardleffe of his life and welfare; vnleffe himfelfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very flaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne advantage. Neuertheleffe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betweene the worth of feuerall men; it is commonly scene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a rellith, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to bee restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should have riches in goodly aboundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but cuery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purfes, and now he hath enough: but (as Couetousnesse is neuer satisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a stock, though 20 it were indeede a good yearely Income. Therefore he deuiseth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleased with the gaines, then with the Art of getting. He is hated for this , and he knowes it well : but hee thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspeeteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale crastilv: but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, fince the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Whereforehee can thinke upon none other securitie, than to disarme all his Subjects: to fortific onely fauour they are maintained Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth gine. should be drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne apperites, in most outragious manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees 40 them grow hatefull to all men elfe. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some En-

himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire

as many luttie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not beeof his 20 owne Countrie: for if not every one, yet some one or other might chance to haue afeeling of the publique milerie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnhonest that can bee found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose glif-man perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely affured vnto the Tyrant.

t. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise wse mercinary Souldiers.

 $N_{\rm jects}^{\rm Ow}$  concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresset her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, then that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jelous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the leffe neede hath shee therefore, to fe. 10 cure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the leffe, to pluck from her Subjects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subjects more than ordinarie fummes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution casie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so gricuous and hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (faith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list : these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Iunenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her flaues; that whilest shee was whipping them, the painted her face, talked with her Goffips, and vied all fignes of 20 neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherwith a domineering State offendeth her Subicets, are free from all fence of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although defire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needefull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throtes, and maintaine them in all villanic, as a Dionystus or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citic is scarce able to deserue the name of

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Ty- 30 rant lodeth his people, are not so heavie, as the burdens imposed by a cruel Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall have neede to vie the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, & generall approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphyficall abstraction of the vninerfall from the singular; 40 or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may fuffice. The defires of one man, how inordinate foeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and foothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him : all which failing, yet is there hope, that his fucceffour may proue better. Many Tyrants have beene changed into worthie Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Government, even 50 a lawfull Monarchie. But they that line under a tyrannicall Citie, have no such hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they bee pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receive the bridle of a more mightie Chariotier. This is wofull : yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the same sore, out of which, others had alreadie sucked their fill. A new Gouernour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home emptic to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with enery mans wealth, or what soener else, in all the Province, is worthic to be defired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be under-gone) and such as eto uery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The love of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Succession of this man, he is more louing than could be withed, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemie to both his fore-goers, who seekes the ruine of all that have beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recoverie, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it served not wholly to restraine their Provinciall Gouernours; who prefuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to 20 worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned under such oppressions; what must we thinke of those, that were vasfalls vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for having beene ill Gouernours. At Carthere all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly denifed by one Magistrate, served aspresidents to instruct another; every man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had beene such, as might affoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, 20 in Skil, that is lively let out by Tullie, may serve to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in seare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By profequating this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Propolition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Provinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyrannic of a Citic is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sureable to the crueltie of fuch Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and againe, suteable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the service of African souldiers; in Africk it seife, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther 40 fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick Warre, shift his mercinaries out of their owne Countries; VI Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior Liu, Dec. 2.1.1.

procul ab domo futurus vter q miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might ferue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries: for they were subject vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet feeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon proprietic of a word, but

50 hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercinaries.

He extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of fuch Souldiers, is well observed by Machianel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, denourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commo- to ditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence. who have entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that have trusted them. These Mercinaries (faith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples. with his Buckler without a fword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Joane of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden ; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his flaues; euen with the same Armie which themselues had leuied for their owne desence. But Lodouick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, having waged an Armic of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered up vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dy-

The like inconvenience is found, in vfing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 fee, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by persuasion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian servitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Agypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Agypt, that Saladine his Succession became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Every Kingdome, in estect, can surnishes. The Bri-40 staines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two

K inodomes.

Against all this may be alleadged, the good successe of the vnited Provinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeede these Low Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Seamen and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortisted: but in open field they have soldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessite therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like 50 necessite made them sorbeare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monic raised by their Trade, they maintained the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vsein helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they speed well, Surely they speed as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitlesse attemps, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that brane Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, selt it to his griese, in his retrait from Groeninghen, when in the very instant, that required their service in sight, his mercinaries cried

of the Historie of the World.

when in the very instant, that required their service in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hirred souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meere concounsels, have ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselues will not deny it. Neither would J touch the honour of Monsieur to the Duke of Aniea, brother to the French King; saue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselues Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his sirst worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee lived to repent it, with griese enough. Euch whileshe was counterseiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginatic forrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to bee surprised and wonne; the death of the Count 20 St. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, smitting his brest, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx it saire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serve to proue, that there is little danger in vsing mercinarie souldiers, or the help of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen 30 of England refused to accept the Soucraigntic of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemic, pursued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too just and wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receive; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or is say were cold in his denotion, to the fide whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, 40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer fort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, raigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious soratleast so seems to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business.

nesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may 50 well hold true in generall: That mercinarie, and for aigne auxiliarie forces, are no lesse advantages and the second selection of the second selection.

CHAP.2. +.4.

t. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to vee the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vee and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse feruice of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how 10 happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoide the inconueniences aboue rehearsed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded viually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes. Hetrurians, Samuites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldomethey did imploy so many,) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which served to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselues. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priviledges and immunities, which they en 20 joved made them affured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they lived almost at libertie, as being bound to little elfe, than to ferue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how casie socuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie have taken occasion of severall advantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subjection. But full they have beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion have sharpely punished; and the people, by degrees, have obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citic of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off removed, even to Tarfus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it selfe. 30 This favour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readic way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relaple, than to hope for better in the future, by feeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten as a special note of the Romans good go-Liu, Dec. 3.1.3. uernment, That when some, for their well-descruing, have had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with 40 their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to for sake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as having beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such love purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vie of sourreigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannic, whose effects are contrarie, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I know, may bee faid, of all Vice, and Irregularitie whatfoeuer. For it is leffe difficult (who focuer thinke otherwise) and more fafe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne afise wom it; vet commonly our passions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Luit, Anger, Feare, orany the like Affection, seduceth our reason, the same vnrulie appente either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wife taketh away all cause of wonder. Intvrannicit is not for for as much as we can hardly descrie the passion, that is of force to infinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seidome beene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants to life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the Government hath beene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Artistelle holds, That Tyran- Arift Politib. 5. nies are of short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did 6.12. the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? why did the Athenians? why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they beignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection, what was that affection, wherein fo many thoufand citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concurre, not with flanding the much diversitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be faine to say, That T yrannie is, by 20 it selfe, a Vice dittin t from others. A Man, we know, is Animal posticum, apt. even by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other defires of Mankinde, are common likewife viito bruit beaftes; and some of them. to bodies wanting lense: but the delire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all forts of Vegetables, for the fustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in convenient measure, both vinto Mankinde, and to all creatures that have fense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obaying, engrafted by

30 Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the order ring of his life, in a ciuile forme of iuttice. All these in bred qualities are good and viefull. Neuerthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastlie, by an unproper terme: fince they grow from appetites, found in leffe worthie creatures than beaftes, and are yet not To common in beaftes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Paffions as descend no lower than vnto bruit beastes, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more gricuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice

40 more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which iffueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all things, or That nothing, should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie distemper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to sublist : yet the defective dulneffe, that permitteth any thing, wil also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actine, and pleaseth it selfe in the excesse, with a false colour of in-

50 flice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though fuch natures are enery where found: for this qualitie troubles not it felfe in feeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or elle a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & fælix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour ( faith PETER GHARRON) assigned to those that know how to increase, or to preserve humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities. empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. CAES AR, and ALEXANDER, have vn-made and flaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mans judgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripeneffe, is none other, than to Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no lesse than Periurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie. the faults of Gluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityocamptes, that vsed their bodily force to the de-Aruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionylius and Agathecles, whose mischieuous heads were affisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie. and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen, and slaues.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of parents over their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simplie, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritic, which one free man can have ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he said; Haue dominion over the fish of the Sea, and over the fowle of the aire, and ouer every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also hee confirmed vnto 20 oah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, 30 shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowle of the aire, upon all that moveth vponthe earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea ; into your hands are they delinered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselves, proves them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturallie slaues. Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnleffe the lawfulneffe thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man that not be punished for the death of a feruant, whom he hath flaine by correction. Exod.c.21.0.21 if the servant live a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captivitie of the 40 Midianitiff girles, which were made bond-flaues, and the San&uarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtleffe the custome hath beene very ancient: for Noab laid this curse vpon Canaan, that hee should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-feruants, and maide-feruants, which were none other than flaues. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this olde kinde of feruilitie: but furely, they are deceived, that thinke fo. Saint Paul defired the libertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth vnto servants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a servant? 50 care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, we it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discoucred by their slaues, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giving libertie to his followers, drewe

many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfnll, vnto his sectators. to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; faue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-servants. untill the times of our last civile warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurses and other the like Trades; flaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not; Ariflotle hath well proto ued, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not fuch a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite distance in chate of the elect & reprobate) the wifest excell the most toolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpasse the wifest of beasts. Therfore when Commiseration hath given way to Reason: we shall find that Nature is the ground euen of Masterly power, & of seruile obedience, which is therto correspondent. But it may be truly faid, that some countries have subsisted long, without the ve of any seruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries have not the vse of any tame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold civill rule, are (though more noble)not fo simplie needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and 20 the like; or of cuerie one, as are hunger and thirst; which not with standing are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and servile dispositions, have libertie to shew themselues begging in the streets; there may wee more infly wonder, how the dangerous toile of sea-faring men can finde enough to vindertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a defire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny bath beene so rife 30 inallages, and practifed, not onely in the fingle rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices have likewise gotten head, and borne a generall fway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have vsed well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee disordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, some are veterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood under condition of flauerie. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike about all respects what soeuer, is the Vertueiuftly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many exam-40 ples. Hetter is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and descruedly, if this praise be due to extraordinarie height of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans owne coun-tric, But if we consider, that a love of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great focuer, can, by it selfe, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hercof; fuch as Danid, Iofaphat, and Iofias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many fuch, the world would soone be happie. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due; or by preferring a leffe excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement 50 either of aduerlitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vieth his authoritie, but addes the travell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to doe instice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gouernment, civilitie is infused, even into those places, that have beene the dennes of sauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a slauish Brehon

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdome doth make the praise not onlie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wives, and the goods. of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, Isav, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthieto adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder fuch a King, it is likelie by Gods blef. fing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Civilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subjects, shall cause the Nations farre 10 off remoued, to wish him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnfpeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Lest any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason. I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuertherlesse a man must die, and may erre : yet wisdome and fame shall set him free, from errour, and from death, both 20 with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a fingular benefite (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse. The people that live vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Souereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muster of men. then of flout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that rulethas ouer saues, shall bee attended in time of necessitie, by slauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee surious, and flaues outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yeelded vn-Hom. Ody J. 1.17. to flaueric, vniuerfally it is found true, that Homer faith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the generall discourse of Gouernement: but where so lively an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vie of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

How the warre against the Mercinarie was diverslie mannaged by HANNO and A MILCAR, with variable successe. The bloudy counsailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall destruction.

Eing now to returne vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I have thus farre digreffed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; an neither care they to pretend, that they feeke their wages already due; fo that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene subiccts vnto Carthage, then might they justly have beene termed Rebels: 50 but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to Subuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercinaries, as Polybius alfo doth. Thele

These vsing the advantage of their present strength, besieg. * Vtica, and Hip- Vicais seapagreta, Cities of great importance, as being feated vpon the westerne Hauen of Car- ted in the great Sar, that thane, where it is divided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards upon the enterstowerds great Lake; Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes aban- far will in the doned, which lay filthie to hinder the Carthaginians, from palling vp into the coun- Promonterie trie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at of Apollo At

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may Farina, or Biferconceine. But the bulinesse it selfe awakes them hastilie. They are hardly press on the and by the conceine. But the bulinesic it the awarestite than the interest of the street of the s these furious dogges from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes Melba. Niger by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made faith, that the their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good pre- is ruined, and paration: but had gotten together what soeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a the place, Towne belieged, as to batter and affaile any place defended against him. With stood, now these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, hee came to Vtica; so suddenly, called Magathat the enemies as men furprifed, for fooke their Trenches, and retired themselves verie ancient. vnto a rifing peece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence and built beof his beafts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome for Carriage, faith Silius, As 20 was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iournie off; presently entred it flo ashedbethe Townesto shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good sellowes, against fore carthage whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilear, to retire and to fight againe, many fo did it after times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soone as they perceived, that hee carthage was knew not how to vica victorie; they affailed their owne Campe, and with great throwne down by the Remans. flaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves with in the third Puin Vica; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe nick Watte Faof the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with sutable indiscretion: mous it was by loofing the benefit of many faire opportunites, and fuffering the enemies to take cato the younpossession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore reasons that let fall their shete-anchor; sending to the field their great Captaine, Amilear, worthy Divine, whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of supply, and seventie Elephants. was Bishop whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of supply, and seventie Elephants. thereof in the Amilear had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the ene- time of Gensemic vpon equall ground. For besides other places of advantage that the Mercena-ric the Arrian who lined all ries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to winne the only Bridge, by which the the time of River Macra, or Bagradas, was paffable vnto thefe, that were to travaile into the that Tyrant, Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those casie for a single man to get and hath writen the storie ouer; but vpon them all waskept such guard, as gaue to Amilear little hope of pre- of his crueluailing in feeking way by force. As for the Bridge it felfe, Matho and his followers ties. 40 were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, intentiue onely to the custodie thereof. But Amilear had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas vsed to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driven in by certaine customarie windes, & could not be driven out againe, by force of that flow River, till the winde falling, or changing, fuffered the weight of the waters to disburden their channel. Hereof he made vie; and taking his opportunity, passed the River; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemie, or of his owne

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilear was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the 30 newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improvident gravitie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their own Master in the Art of Warre. whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than sisteene thousand of their owne societie, were come from Vices; and other tenne thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Kkkkk 2

Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilear; and they were, in their owne indeement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they refolued to charge him on all fides, and beate him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him; watching for some advantage; and fill exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onfet. Especially they that followed pim in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilear held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee shewe of any delire to fight, but suffered the rashnes of his enemies to increase, 10 till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neere, as would be elittle for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace. as made a shewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presently fell yon his skirts; beloeuing, that for feare of them he was ready to runne away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driving at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilear wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, fothat amazed with the apprehension of inexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were lixe thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two 20 thousand taken; the rest fled; some to the Campe at Vinca; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilear followed them to fast, that he wanne the place cafily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilear in pursuing it. caused many Townes revolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africke, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recouerie of their freedome; hee per-Swaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amil- 39 car, and alwaics to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessarie for Amilear, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not levell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had oncegotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, furrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Aunidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the fame of Amilear his personall worth didgreatly benefit his countrie. For Warauas w, a yong gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion serving to get the acquaintance 40 and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired : and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to dochim all service. Amilear joyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Warauasus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approuchis owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were flaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autaritus the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischiefe. Amilear dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become 50 his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake tending to winne from them, the hearts of their fouldiers. Wherefore they refolued to take fuch order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilear, nor to hope for any safetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertifement, wherein was contained, that fome of their company respective onely of their private benefit, and carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Ge/co, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the fouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; to and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilear, toward fome, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemic Gesco would prooue, if hee might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale; were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autaritus and speakes his minde plainely: faving, that it were the best, year the onely way, for the common safetic, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were denising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custodie; that by such a course every one should be ingaged in the pre-20 fent Action, as having none other hope left, than in victoric alone; finally, that fuch as would speake here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitours. This Autaritus was in great credit with the fouldiours, and could speake fundrie languages, in such fort, that hee was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gefco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleffe there were some, that for loue of Gesco. fought to alter his intended crueltie; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they there with all contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be served in like fort : and that the subjects or friends of 30 Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they observed eucrafterwards.

of the Historie of the World.

Of this crueltie I need say no more, then that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achi Tophel: All Israel shall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be from. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to avoide the punishment of leffe offences.committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengefull spirits of those that have beene wronged, are breeders of this desparacion: to which may be added, some deficiencie of Lawes, in diffinguishing the pu-40 nishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their seucrals crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If PHOCAS be a coward (said the Emperour MAVRITIVS) then is he murderous. To be sted fast and sure, in taking revenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defensative against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discouered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwife would have repented, and fought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought fomuch woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the fame pu-50 nilhment, is awarded vnto the leffe offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconveniences Mercie and Severitie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilear failed. For as long as these his owne fouldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie Kkkkk 2 was readie to inuite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond allregard of honestie and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable to the read their villanie with answerable to the read to t

ble vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be denoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilear, and done little, as may sceme, for that nothing is remembred of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilear forrie to want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, & came to Amilear, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this accesse of strength Amilear was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe 10 nothing; such was the hatred betweene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The nothing; such was the hatred betweene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Townes of View and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now revolt vnto the enemie, murdering all the soludiours that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in solue weather: and Carthage it selle stood in danger of being besieged, about which Mathe and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send foorth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armic. This was the common practice of those two 20 mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes hauc often imitated; perswading themselues, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They have also iouned two chiefe Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restraine the ambition of any one, that should be trufted with so great a strength. For hercof all Common-weales have beene icalous, having beene taught by their examples that have made themselves T yrants ouer those Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point, the Venetians have bin fo circumspect, as they have for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they have made. It is true, that the equal 30 authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ferueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in mannaging the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made necre vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one yeeres service; it is no marvaile, though each of the Confuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dittator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the 40 manner, to fend foorth both the Confuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joined in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prenaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or feldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the leffe able Captaine, though of equal authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armic, received great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre we shall finde examples. 50 On the contrarie fide, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes mannaged by one, they seldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which served the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truly be faid, that had not their temper been better, than the judgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Militades; their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicilithe one being fo ouer-warie, and the other fo hastie, as all came to nought that they undertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkeable service. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall diferetion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of judgement, and so the contrarie, by which the best occasions are as often ouershipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably no undertaken. I remember it well that when the Prince of Condy was flaine after the Battaile of Iarnas, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chaftellon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armic) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the faid Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themfelues, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For fo much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduitednesse of the other. as whatfoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Garthaginians in this present busines: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vn20 willing to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armiethat serued vnder them. The judgement of the Armic was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did; and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilear; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and adventure much; having in their Campe aboue situe thousand, besides these that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neverthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault: and the entrance of victuailes they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracufe, though during the warres in Sicil he affifted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now fent succours to the Carthaginius: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne, because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their disgestion, the Principalitie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some sleender affishance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercinaries. This they did, to show a kind of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the fequele manifestly proued.

CHAP.2. $.3.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilear was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zareas an African Captaine affisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilear worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraussus, made Spendius search sullto descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his sormer method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the so straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might show it selfe, with little disaduantage. But Amilear had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemie to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomake to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreseeing, that neceffitie mightteach them, to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and thut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miferably for succour, that came not: and having spent all their victuailes, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they fuffred patiently, as knowing that they had not descrued any fauour from Carthage; 10 and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not bee vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitie, that they were faine to denoure their owne companions, and yet law none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deferued, vnleffe they would goe foorth to Amilear, and fecke fuch peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarras, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was refolued, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselues, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they send to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilear in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet 20 by the conditions which Amilear granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he foorth with went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselues betraied: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same 30 astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amiliar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and case in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more,

This was a famous exploit: and the newest bereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Narauafus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places readie to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon seare of deserved vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of 40 the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrific those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedie victorie had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilear on the opposite side: too farre asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miserie of his companion, and knew not how to avoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out voon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all 50 danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie he fallied, that after an exceeding flaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently renenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilear knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loffe. to continue the fiege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

CHAP.2. S.3.

The terrour was no leffe within Carthage, voon the fame of this loffe; than had beene the ioy of the late great victorie. All that could be are armes, were fent into the field, under Hanne; whom, it feemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines furniting the lateaccidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them. forbidding the imployment of one fole Generall, necre vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to hauetrusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastie to exigent, to deutle about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilears campe, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It neerely touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelefnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemie to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesseafter many conferences, the authoritie of the Senatours prevailed; Amilear and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities. to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and deadly Liu. Du.3.1.1. hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vse the reputation 20 of his late fuccesse, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilear. The skirmishes, and light exercites of warre, wherein Amilear trained his Carthaginians, did so farreabate the flrength, and with all diminish the credit of Marko, that he resolved to tric the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his defires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthagimans were no lesse prone, than Matho: as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it felfe in many trials; and well affured of Amilear his great worth, whereunto the enemie had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inui-30 ting their friends to helpe; and drawing foorth into the fielde, all that lay in Garrifon.

The iffue of this Battaile might have beene forctold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, saue their daring spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginius had reason to dare, as hauing often beene victorious: and in all points elfethey had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not eafily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the delire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their 40 State would, in Citizens, whofefuture and prefent good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne agreat victorie, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were flaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himfelfe was taken aline. Immediacly upon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled made submission to their old masters : Vtica onely, and Hoppagreta stood out, as knowing how little they descrued of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best bleafedthe victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and a-50 bout foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrarie to the peace.

Hilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like to fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vie. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the sudden. But these companions that followed *Hanne*, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the *Sardinian** Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer waskindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all 20 icalousie and distrust, they resolued to hang up their Commander *Hanne**, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue undertaken the quarrell of an uniust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to affist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to performe some such Actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their desence against the Lacedamonians, by Arasus; who, when hee had formerly possess the similar of their Citie, by right of warre, did 30 not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Revolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Cesont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit lesseviolent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his affociates : onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Ilanders were no leffe glad, than the fouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they 40 could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the fouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwife, the fouldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was devolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) have rifen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common delire of both had once taken effect: vnlessetheriches of Carthage had ferued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to faue themselves in Ita- 50 he. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refufed, vpon reasons that follow.

the Cartbaginians tooke almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: fo that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly veelded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they torbeare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vica, offering it selfe vnto their subjection. This might have ferued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the iffue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept to them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriuing better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilear: who had he beene ouerthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled herfelfe under protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately striuen for superioritie. That extreme necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from fuch a miserable choice. Wherfore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but 20 finking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpontheir shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recoucrie of Sardinia: then did Ambition put offher goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feete againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enscebled and impouerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeed against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to relist; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand, renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, 30 in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inualion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently fought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paied, how hardly socuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace alreadic, which Amilear purposeth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilear lives not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renoumed fonne.

Q. V. How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the Sfrican Rebellion, and the fecond Punicke Warre.

He iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citic long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easilie tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the icalousic of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterran leas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and sourraigne trust was committed vnto Amilear: vpon whom whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recover strength by his meanes, that had faued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men, that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilear and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of pronoking the Romans, in whole amitie they laid, that the felicitie of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common weale; they got none other reputation. than of singularitie: which the ignorant fort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glory of Amilear was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable feruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeeres that he lived there, hee subjected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in 2 battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was invironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and same, by which in many

After the death of Amilear; Afdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the 20 Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding fo many subiccts and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow icalous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of "The Spaniards New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not alittle troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their 30 neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselves in a warre of farre leffe importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) given them ley sure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily exthe yeare 1385 pected to be inuaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hecrequest; since his request shall have the vertue of a com-

Yet were the Romans veterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them 40 to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probabilitie) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had beene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should for beare to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie 50 of Carthage; they seeme to have hoped, that how soeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to avoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the braueric of one man might proue more fastidious, and, refenting the iniurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, quarrell, that they so much defired; and might embrace at leifure, when once they had found apparent cause. But As druball finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diflike at all: and whereas they would have this infolent conenant inferted into the articles of peace; he tooke voon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had beene fo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preffed by the Romans. for feare of present warre; had ratified this new composition made by Afdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, vnlesse 10 an oath had also beene extorted, to make all fure. But fince all paffed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Asarubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refuling to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiving blowes from a stouter Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection on of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Car-20 thaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South fide of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemie in warre to the Carthaginians) into their focietie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuerthelesse, if we confider the late agreement made with Afdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which 30 regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians, though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one fide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, onthe other side of that River, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoever it were; this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former injuries had beenc. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthagenian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they lift. In fuch termes were 40 the Carthaginians, when Afdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being flaine by a flaue, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilear, was chosen Generall in his stead.

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the fonne of DEMETRIVE

N the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrbus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had sound it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The so whole countrie had recoursed by degrees, a forme of libertie: the whole countrie had recouered by degrees, a forme of libertie : the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conucriton to the better, proceeded from the like diffensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Selencus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie 20 yeeres; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene alreadic shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrbus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his fouldiours, euen at fuch time, as having ouerthrowne with great flaughter an Amic of the Gaules, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this youg Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of 30 Greece. The Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Agean and Ionique Scas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other, besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the fonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corintb in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwardsit pal- 40 fed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The device was this. Antigonus fent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicas, and secke her marriage. The foolishold widdow perceived not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readie, to confent, as was his sonne to desire it, and came this ther in person to solemnize it. Hercupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all forts of games : in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose icalousie had beene ex- 50 ceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase hee was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the gravitie beseeming his old age. But as hee had stollen it; fo was it againe stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the losse of it, being alreadic spent with age.

Demetrius;

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten veeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Atolians, and Acheans, held him continually busied in warre; wherin his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay : and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a yong child when his father died and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritie of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though hee respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This 10 Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Dolon, that is as much as, Will gine, because he was flow in his liberalitie. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good service, hee tooke state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, then onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appealed by faire words, and a seeming unwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernment. The Achaians tooke from him the Citic of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not beene endangered by a necrer enemy. But civile diffention, 20 which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew iteafily now againe, when it had scarcely recourred strength after a long sicknesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no leffe authoritie therein, than Philip the father of A. lexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians, from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and same: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equalitic of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to bee gouerned by one Lawe, and to vse

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclida, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possest the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his sonnes sought to change the Legall government of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as feeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small 40 changes according to the discriftic of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olemu, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaile of Leuelres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a warre, no leffe foolish than cruell, among themselues. But in the one hundred and source and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or necre it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and People, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimai, united themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For having 50 beene, some of them Partisans with fundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voiage into Italie. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whom also the Cites of Tritas, and Phars, ioyned themselues;

Ægira chased outher Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Consederacie. These Cities, for twentie & sine yeeres, vsed the same forme of Gouernement with the Achaians; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the sirst, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile. whilest his Gountrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Genatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get 10 among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sievonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction scrued well enough against Antigonus, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus deliucred his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: fo further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerfies, betweene the banished Sieyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands: as also with the same mony he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises 20 following that redounded to the fingular good of all Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some firong and fure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselse, that made a dangerous voiage to him into Agypt, and fed his pleafure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pecces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by some theeues that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rockes. 39 Yet was he saine to sight for it, ere he could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne scare, than by any sorce of the afailants; as mistrusting less the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having loss the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had

prefumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In the sekinde of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was astimorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might looke pale and tremble, when 40 he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto severall forts of action. In resoluing which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in neede of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he was vareproveable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achain, the Megarians revolted from after from Antigonus, and entred into the fame Corposite ration. So did the Trazenians, and the Epidawians: whereby this new creeked State grew so powerfull, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Arains wasted the Ile of Salamis, to show his strength, and fent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citis by shew of love; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have wonne it. if the Citizens would have lent any helpe to the recoverie of their owne freedome; fundrie times. and with divers event, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and flue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: until at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by 10 Aratus, that he consented to religne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians. Whilest this businesse with the Argines was on foot, Lystadas the T yrant of Megalapolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citic, and annexed. it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got fuch credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yeerly Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man) cuerie second yeere, for a certaine while, he and Aratus succceding one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare . 20 in due time.

The Acheans having obtayned so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolomie King of Agypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and sin title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sca and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in service, or in solent in command. Neverthelesse when 30 Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monic, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thencesoorth held good correspondence with the Acheans, long them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their owne

CHAP.2. S.6.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponne fus it felfe, waxe very powerfull, by flurdine fe of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had floutly defended themselues 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much; partly by the natural strength and fastnesse of their Countries but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other businesse, as hath beene related. They had molested Castander, in fauour of Antizonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a sout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or leffe, with al the Kings of Mecedon succeeding him. They'likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetual traunile: seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserved the name of vajo lour, seeing they had no regard of honestie or friendship; measuring all things by their owne infolent wil, and thinking al people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themselues.

These Atolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrie. They had inuaded the friends of the Acheans; taken and sacked L1111 2 Pallene;

Pallene; where although they were foundly beaten by Aratus; yet their defire of gaine made them greedie of a new voiage thither, as to a Countrie wherein some what was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to seeke helpe of the Acheans; which they obtained. The warre which the Acheans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Atticu, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the A. tolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Atolians, giving thanks in words, deuised how to requite the benefit 10 with some great mischiete. They saw that the Acheans were desirous, to bring all Pelopannesiss into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedamonians were very lealous. Wherefore these Atolians laboured carnelly, to set the Lacedemonians and Acheans together by the cares : hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and fo get no small share, both in bootic and Territoric. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdome had fustained by the Acheans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedamonians cause 20 to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late; and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Archadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them, seeing that all Peloponne fus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreadie become Achaan.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Atolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Auarice and Luxurie raigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit, that had sometime 30 beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not aboue one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people and desirons of innouation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Azis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lyeargus his laws. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer fort were glad of this : but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the 40 Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his flead. But agis his friends and Counfailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne private commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themsclues were deeply indebted: but the division of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leenidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerse Kings driven to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dilmissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his 50 enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was never knowne in Sparta: and (which is the moreodious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the lawes, vling their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes re-

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ferued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioune Lacedamon to the Achean Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such advantages, & attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the generall good of Peloponness, and to the benesit of Spartait selfe, ifit could have beene wrought by perswasion. Burthe same man who redressed the disorders of Sparte, and reuenged the death 10 of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achems, even in their owne kind: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponne us; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedamonians and their King, should have beene the principall; not they and their Prator. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be flaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne some Cleamenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and fought to winne her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a defire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all 20 occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agu, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an elfate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therfore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenaum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretendedtitle he readily performed it. Hercof Aratus made no complaint, but fought to take by surprise Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedamonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painefull nights travaile, and discovered his enmitte to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing fortic. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discoursed the Atolian practice, and therfore would have staicd the quarrell from proceeding 30 too farre. But Lyfisdas and Asiftomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristomschas was at that time General of the Acheans, (He & Lyfiades being of great account, fince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who fent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his affiftance in a journie to be made into Leconia. No diffwalions of Aratus would ferue: therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, littleplealing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, hedurst not fight; but opposed himselse against Aristomachus, who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achaans twentiethousand foot, & one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave repu-40 tation to the Lacedemonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuerthelesse the Ackesns would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the yere, following against Lystadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall him selfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the flanderous wordes of Lyfiadias. Thereforche purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, necre vnto the Mount Lycaus, by Cleamenes, who vanquilled him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide him selfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to have beene slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompenced by a trick of his owne more natural occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue been expopeded, had he bin victorious. For whillt there was no suspition of any great matter that he could undertake; he secretly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioyned themselues with the Achaians; but shortly upon seare, or some other passion, they gaue themselues to the Atolians; and from the Etolians, presently after this victoric, to Cleomenes. from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achean Societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Gleomenes and he encountred necre vnto Megalopolis; where the Acheans had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his advantage, Therupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedamonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driven backe vpon their owne Companions; in fuch fort, 10 that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Acheans against Aratus : yet their indignation proceeded no further than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuerthelesse; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Acheans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painefull journies, for sooke the Achean warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee slue the Ephon; and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lyeurgus. Then gave hee an accompt of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephon; had incroched vpon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to save it selfe from the Lossans, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could takeaduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durft issue for the Citic, for seare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had washed all the Countrie of Megalopsis; had ranged ouer all Areasia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and readic to take other places, even of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritic, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalitic of Greec. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possessing of sew Townes: but adventured to winne or lose all. The Etolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinas, Teges, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Etolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee deuised how to prouide against the worst, and eitherto repaire all, or (ifit could not bee) to save all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, heerefused; fearing to bee so sarrepress, as to hazzard in one battaile all 50 the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended vpon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not for sake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantines had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Acheans, was now revolved vnto the enemie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too sarre off to helpe; and the necrenesse of Antigonus was very dange-to rous; yet might be vsefull, if this King would as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemie, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practifed with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and in-

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, euer fince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore descrued succour; yet could not well bee relieued by the Achaans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leave and 20 good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted for lack of what elfe to answere; and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecesfours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aide. But when they delinered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Acheans under the Patronage of 30 Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue eare to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Achaans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers, to Aratus; affuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to have been grounded vpon any hatred to the Masedonians, but only vpon a just and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answere they returne to Megalopolis: and are presently fent away to the Councell of Achsia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessitie of the time required.

.40 The Achaens were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their defire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie: adding neuerthelesse, that it were not amisse, first of all to trie their owne abilitie; which it it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protestor. Thus hee shewed himselse moderate, in that which himselse of all others did most wish to the end, that hee might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only sollowed, and that so leisurably, the generall consent.

Neuerthelesse it true estimation, this sinenesse of Aratus might have beene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since therby he should both have freed his

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should have restored vnto the vniuerfall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had berest it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittic) that Vertue having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principalitie. by length of time, and fuccesse of many actions; can ill endure the hastic growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfelikely to bee ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedamonians there was none; than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood indoubt of the one, when he thought himselse more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was instly plagued, when he 10 faw his owne honors reversed by the insolent Macedonians; and in stead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules was faine to doe sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of fine descents, and whom perhaps he might haue seene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vsed to the Acheans; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warie both in trusting & disburling. Cleomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with Antigonus was afoot, paffed through Arcadia with an Armie, & laboured by all meanes 20 to draw the Acheans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were affembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had fo great a victorie, that the enemie was no longerable to keepe the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselues the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would 39 condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore al places taken from them, and al his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molectation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Acheans: who desired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than thev had ever beene fince the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, year or fince the Perfan Inuasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all. with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme fick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to 40 be deferred to another time. Neuerthelesse he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achaans in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and sought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimenafraid of refoluing. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leave his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiving Hostages for safetic of his person. Cleomenes was already farre on his way, when he met with this advertisement : and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had beene an easie matter, to have told him so 50 much at the first, and not have made him come so farre with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would aduenture himselfe into the Citie, then to deprine him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus feared. and for which he fought to hinder his comming thither in person lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleamenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, & finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leaving all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes 10 tookehis aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre, Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relicue the distressed Acheans, Antigonus gaucas good words as could be wished: sauing that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinibus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselse to be saddled & bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing 20 the Corinthians had no way descrued, to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yetat length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and fent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other lide ranne to Cleomenes; who loft no time, but made hafte with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might that Aratu his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to a-30 greement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnefu: promiling that if he would harken to these perswasions, then would he give him double the same pension, which hee had beene wont to receive of King Ptolemie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold affured foueraigntie of the Countrie; he defired thatit might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be injurtly kept by the Lacedamonians and Acheans. All this entreatic served to no purpose. For Aralus, reiecting vtterly the motion, fent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acrecorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seised upon the goods of Araius in Corinth, and wasted all the issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, 40 Countrie of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersarie was natiue.

Antigonus in the meanetime drew neere to the Ishmus; having passed with his Armie through Euber, because the Atolians held the streights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good fuccesse of this iournie. At his comming thither he found the Lacedamonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able fo to doe: hee fecretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; 50 but was violently driven out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sieyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not

gonus, and no leffe troubled his Endmies. The echican's were gotten into that Cities. and the Garrison which Cleamenes had left therein, thoughir was not driven out of the Citadell, yet was hardly diffressed, and stood in neede of present helpe. Areos had alwaies bin endmie to Sparra, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbare to chase our those whom he most suspected; partly, arthe entreatic officiends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elfewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: inother places, where it would 10 haus beene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Atheans; affailed his Garrison; cut in pecces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the desence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderstood. by continual meffages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost loft : hee beganne to feare, left his labour inguarding the entry should grow friuolous; the Acheans in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee for sooke his custodie of the Ishmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he 20 could faue, he meant to truft fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argues and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horse men of Antigonus were discouered a-farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfc (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleamenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a saferetrait. This he did; and got him home into Laconia: loosing in short space all, or most, of that which he had beene long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored 30 them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Agium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into covenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, & somwhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours. as facrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Si- 40 evenians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (for sooth) a very wise bargaine, if in stead of Cleomenes that would have beene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaans. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those T yrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuerthelesse in taking re- 50 uenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens; and from them revolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like fort handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and crueltie flewed to the Acheans. For he flue all the principall Citizens, and fold the reft, men, women, and children, all for bond-flaues: dividing the fpoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Acheans. The Towne it felse was given by Antigonus to the Argines: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus having charge of this businesses, caused it to be new-named Antigonus. Surely of this crueltie there can be no better excuse; than even the flatterie, which Aratus was driven to vieto Antigonus: for as functions it was a token of servicitie, whereinto they had viged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus require. To But leaving to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Civill state of the Acheans; Let vs returne into his warre against the Lacedamonian. The next Summer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenu , Heraa, and Telphussa: Mantinea he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Acheans; with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: He had few Soul-20 diers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Agyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, valefle he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Agypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was flow; as dealing in the bufineffe of Greece, rather for his mindes fake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serve. He manumised all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedamonian flaues: taking monie for their libertic, and arming two thonfand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, hee came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as having defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus neere at hand in Agium. The 30 Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, role haftily against him;& though they could not drive him out, yet faued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their cleape. He tent after the Citizens, offering their Towncand goods to them againe, if they would bee of hispartic. Butthey brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes assonished the Achains at Agum: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus fent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were folong in comming, that Cleomenes was fafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselseto Argos, thereto passe the rest of this valucky winter, somewhat 40 further from the eyes of the greened Acheans. When he had laine awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argines perceiuing that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not iffue into the field ; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But hee was wifer then to be moued with their clamours; and fuffered them to fee their villages burnt; to bid him religne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfic their passions with soolish wordes; rather than he would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honour than

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemie, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made could easily be repaired. By this Cleamenes had his desire, in weakning the reputati-

fuch hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inualion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrie of the Argines, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, asit were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut up; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the schaan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by fetting vp his reft, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot and 10 twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Ganles, Epirots, Baotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all forts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to sceke entrance. Antigonus comming to Selasia, found his enemic so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hils of Ena and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly defired, without the hazzard of his whole armie, in affayling their wel-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their 20 hopes and feares) both Kings being refolued to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua, but his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaan foot, that the Spartan horse, & lightarmed foot, incamped in the streight vallie between those hils, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not onely disordered them, but were like to have endangered al the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would have made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this adpantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay. Philopæmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, served 30 then on horse, as a private yong man, among the Achaans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall backe vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonius had given order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they received a figne from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiving them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countrimen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not onely to leave the Illyrians, but feeke how to faue themselves. Being so farre advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, 40 through the vnskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perfwaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon cuen termes. So he recouered the Hill top; where though he was fore hurt, yet yee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedamonians were beaten from it, with great flaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleamenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other fide, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himfelfe, was like to have been furrounded and loft, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an ex- 50 traordinarie speede. In this battaile ended the glorie of Lacedamon, which, as a light readie to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no defire to flay, finding onely two hundred left, of fixe thouland Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So hee perswaded his people to yeelde themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Agypt. Hee was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vndertooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane scason bee had a 10 pension allowed him, of source and twentie talents, yearely. But this Prolemic died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was defirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither give him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Agypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countrimen, he vndertooke 20 a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and having walked vp and downe the firects, without refifiance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to bee ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation and flue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpontheold Queenc. Such was the end of Cleomones; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to 30 come to such a bloudie ende, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grandchildren. After the Victoric at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: whereinto neuer the sorce of any Enemie, before him, could make way, Hee kindely entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnessus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Hyrians ouer-ranne, and destroied the Countrie. Had these news come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deserred the sight, a sew dayes longer, or at least-wise tarried a few dayes after the sight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedemon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it selfe over all Greece. But God had otherwise deter-

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-strayning his voice; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space sinished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemie, Philopater; beganneto raigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemie, I have been the last when he first was King, yet continued a Boy,

50 though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuenteene yeeres of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsual in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; youn Mmmmm 2 which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

ð. VII

How the Illyrians infefted the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were to built in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselues worke among the Sardinians and Consians, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Hyrians, wherein they got much bonour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liule faith, a tumule then a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea; it hath bene shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to

The Elyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a trouble some Nation, 20 impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foc. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Mucedon, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were befreged by the Atolians, for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty : the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the fiege to an end, and wonne the Towne : others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later 30 ages, who thought vpon dividing the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they loft, at Poitters and at Agincourt. The Atolians wifely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be iountly intitled in the victorie, and have equall authoritie in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; & though good relistance was made, yet got the victoric, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly fallied out of the Towne. Many of the Atolians were flaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was loft: the Illy- 40 rians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Atolians had directed them by example.

The fuccess of this voyage, highly pleased sigron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoucts of the Greeks, hee found it not vneasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurife, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he less that

Tenta gaue her people free libertie, to roball Nation at Sea, making no difference between e friend and foe; as if shee had beene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing hee Captaines, to make Warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, & stayed at the Citie of Phanice, to take in victuailes and other neceffaries. There lay in Phanice eight hundred Gaules; that having beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to berray, first Agricentum then Erys to the Romans; but fayling to do either, they nevertheleffe revolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betraied Phanies to which deferued none other, in trufting them. Al Epirus was prefently in armes, and hastned to drive out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas; whom Queene Tenta had fent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the threights adioy sing, by which these new commers mustenter into their Countrie; another part of these remaines at Phanice, to continue the fiege. Neither the one, northe other, feed well in their businesse. For seerdilardas found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were befreged within Phanice, fallied out of the towns, and gaue fuch an ouerthrow 20 to the Epirots, as made them despaire of saving their Countrie, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embalfadours were fent to the Achaens and Ætolians: crawing their helpe, with very pittifull termes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilai das. But Scerdilai das was called home, by letters from Tenta the Queene, that fignified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered compolition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransometheir Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Having made this profitable 30 and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrie by Land, sending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whileft they lay at Phanice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstaine from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought al to good order, saue only the towne of Ista, which 40 her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly affoord a good looke to the vnmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their fpeech was ended, she vouchfafed to tell them, That injurie in publike shee would doe them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how thev best could, by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those private wrongs that are borne out by publike authoritie: therfore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the

Jo Queene tooke so impatiently, that no renenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had been the way, to set her heart at rest, which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflich it ener after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by

After this good beginning, the Confull failed alongst the coast, to apollonia; ac- Apollonia, a Companied with Demetria, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailer and guide. Dirtachium.or To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, num- Daragge, ypon bred at twentie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten to the Sca-coast. wards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had befieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Siffopolis. Armie, they disperse themselues. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ships; and enforce the Queene Teuta to for sake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rifon, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best 10 places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staics behinde, and profecutes the warre, in such fort, that Teuta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer fend any of her ships one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade. After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into diversparts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: 20 which if it hapned, they were wife enough to play their ownegames. But no fuch matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth. That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Ilhmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Liffa: except it were some

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of HANNIBALinto Italie.

He Gaules that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the affistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it : though the iffue of that

Warre proued notanswerable to the beginning, if we may give credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Ma-40 ny ouerthrowes they received; and if they got any victorie, it yeelded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than welladuised: lightly stirred up to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gane alwaies carefull heede to their approch, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Gallici; tumults of the Gaules; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vied to rife with great Armies: but 50 after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occafion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow; they would rest ten, or twelue yeeres, fometimes twentie or thirtie : till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested; the state of Rome, that against these made only desensive warre, had leisure to grow, by setting

Sea, confisting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Fulurus; the other by Land led by A. Polthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction; for this injurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeed econtrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of warre and destruction, therfore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a leffon taught by Nature, that Embaffadors should passe freely, and in safetic, between enemies. Neuerthelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassiadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they to should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus emploied, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subjects, of an enemie. And so might the Athenians have answered it, when they flew the Lacedamonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which pra-Etile against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law what soeuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practife against the life of another, much leffe may an Embassadour doe it without incurring justly the fame danger of punishment, with other Traitors, in which case, his place gives him 20 no priviledge at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the flaughter of their Embassadour Corun-

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to firre against her. She was indeede in an errour; that hath vndone many of all forts, greater and leffe than she, both before and since: Hauing more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee casily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be litle troubled. Had the confidered, that her whole Armie, which wrought 30 fuch wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than often thousand men; and that neuerthelesse, it preuailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would have continued to vse her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent foorth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could bee gotten. This fleet divided it selfe; and one part of it sell with a Dyrrachium, a Dyrrachium; the other, with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the fometime cal-fementime cal-fementi and now Du- wasted the Isle; and belieged the Towne. The Towne of Coreyra, difmaied with this ouerthow, opened the gates llands of Pha-ros and coregra, vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: senb coreyra, an ding the rest of his forces to beliege Dyrrachium. In the meane scason, Teuta was anlland of the Adriatick Sea, gric with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie a-

Wherefore the Consult sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coreyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delinered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and fubmitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raise: that the Gaules never fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was transiling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Citic. But it seemes that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefor like to fmart, when soeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set 10 vpon the Gaules in their owne Countrie; and that was three yeeres before the com. ming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, inuading Hetruria, and belieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile and flaine L. Cacilius with the most of his Armic. Mannius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassadours they slue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrie, and sent a Colonie of their owne e There were to inhabit it. This caused the Boy, another people of Gaule, to seare the like meadivers nations fure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their fide. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them fue for peace, ly ia, Germanie, which lasted untill this end of the Illyrian warre. It vexed the Gaules, to fee a Roman Colonic planted in their Countrie; who had in Reurbonois in France, and in beene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours per-Aquitane; but these Boy were force. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are neerer; like as they called Cifalpines or by-bither the Alpes, those who dwelt betweene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their 30 diffunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the cares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were viged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, belides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serve to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it selfe, would not over-joy the Multitude But the Commonaltie of Rome tooke this in so good part, not with standing all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will. This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boy: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Gaules had reason to resolue, that themselves also should bee rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joyned with the Boil, & vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodaf cenomanni, nus, wageable as the Switzers in thefetimes. The Geffates having received a great are the people Impreft, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings, Concelitanus & Aneroeabout Bergamo, flus: who with the Boij and Infubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Seno-galli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrarie side, the 50 these cenoman- Venetians, and the f Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeving in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For scare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules the Countie were forced to leave a good part of their Armic, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, fend Amilius to Rimine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Confull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the confideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had affembled, they caused a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies; who were no lesse willing than themfelues, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not bee prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Multer, deserue to be recorded : be-10 cause they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consults they fent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: cuery Legion confifting of fine thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any miladuenture came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, & fourethousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the V mbri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boy, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly dimi-20 nished. There were besides these, to bee ready against all vicertaine chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and fine thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seventie thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand, in that of the B Japy ges, and Mellapy ges, fiftie thousand foot, and fixteene thousand g Japy ges and horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Mellapyzes h Marfi, Marrucini k Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twentie thousand foot, and four one Nation thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Twentum, who are also

30 containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, and soure hundred horse. So as of called Sometimes Period. the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there ares, Apulians, were registred two hundred and fiftiethousand foot; and of horse, three and twen-and calle vante tie thousand : of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thouland foot and about fixe thouland horse. Casting up the whole forces of all containing the the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to head-land of feuen hundred thousand foot, and seventie thousand horse. But the number is catabria. fomewhat miffe-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead h A people of paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls shorenine thoufand two hundred of the foot.

How great focuer this Muster was, it seemes to have beene like vnto that, which them a people Loclowick Sforza made, when Lewesthe twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the bet- k A people of ter to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, hee tooke a Roll of all persons able to Campaniascalbeare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth Ferentines, faith part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasymene, Leander. and Canne, did not confume any fuch proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their flaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canne. Wherefore the maruaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of fuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, 30 as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the mouth of the Roman Armic, sent into Tuscane, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their journie. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head : and in the same evening discovered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratageme: that shewed no great finenesse of wit, but such, as well bescemed those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night. they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they give order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as 10 might rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hastie departure, as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. £ milius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Consull, the Gaules consult, whether they should give the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which dispute, Aneroestus, one of their Kings, perfwades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice 20 they all embrace; for feeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisedome, to hazzard

This indeede had beene a good refolution, if they had taken it, before the enemic had beene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armic. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaics going on from the pursuing enemie, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which for sakes 39 the field, perceives, and feares some advantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once posses the heart of man, it calleth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable ouerthrow, that the French received in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no leffe. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustained the pursuing enemic a long time, and gaue the foot leifure to trot away; yet being retarded by often tur- 40 nings, the Spanish foot ouer-tooke and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betweene the Imperialls, and the French; Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes see the enemie, before they left the field. So was Strosi ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to give battaile) have done. Ie ne trouve point (saith the Marshall MONLVC) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retrait; I finde nothing in the arte of marre fo difficult, as, to make a safe retrait. A sure Rule it is, that there 50 is leffe dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M'. de la None giues this judgement, of a daies retrait, madein France, presently before the battaile of Moncountour. For (faith he) staying vpon our reputation, in Thew not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day:

whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And vet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of N affau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with fo great resolution, as hee faued the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selse was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaule, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemie, & their faces homeward. Amilius followes them. as necreas he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his advantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Confull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pifa; fo 10 as the Gaules, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Amilius, they appoint the Gessand the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gaules inhabiting vpon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius defcribeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroestus, with fortic thousand of their Vassalls.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeere following this ouerthrow. by the 20 new Consulls, Faluius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their vi-Ctorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gaules , to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consulls beat the Boil; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that raigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and prevaile very farre, being strongly affisted by the Cenomanniand the Venetians. Neuerthelesse these Consulls were renoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to refigne their Office: because the Augures, or Sooth ayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all forts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not 30 only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this renocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hastie to open them : but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countrie; then pervsed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, foreagainst the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great

This was that Flaminius, who had propouded the Decree, for dividing the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, 40 that understanding the Majestie of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commission; did not fland highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, & taught them to know and vsetheir power, ouer himselse, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the furer fide, and found imitatours, that rose by the fame arte; which in processe of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consulls, for the rest of that yeere. The Gaules about this time desired peace, and were like to have obtained it: though the new Consulls To were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirrie thousand of the Gellates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and joyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consults hasted into their Pronince, where they belieged Acerra, a towne not farre from 200uaro (so farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To divert

10 The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians.
HANNIBAL befiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whileft the Romans are bufied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

A N N I B A L, the fonne of Amilear, was about fixe and twentie yeeres old, when hee was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armic, as soone as Afaribal was dead: and the election was ratified by the state at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine samily (so called of Amilear, whose surname was Bareas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps have been eleste envied, by these domestical commens; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in government, and beene the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall goodwill, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilear, in saving his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it 30 with treasures and great reuenewes; so was it retained by the same good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanne therefore, and his Partifans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreproueable; nor to performe the like services vnto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous advice of not prouoking the Romans. This they scasoned otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barebine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no leffe Barehine, than Hannibalhimselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the ar-40 ticles of peace, affoorded no securitie to Carthage; were shee never so quiet, and officious; vnlesse she would yeeld to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than untill the Romans could find fome good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vnhappie time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driven to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; & to give away balely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon termes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this businesse) it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and affistance, euen of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne was so for the free feet of the start them from this siege, Britomarus sate downe before Clastidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Confulls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not (uffice to make the Romans breake up their fiege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, & fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consulls comming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leifure to rest themfelues after their journie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both other fe and foot: but he thought fo well to of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no leffe daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that fufficed to commend him. He flue and difarmed Britomarus, in prefence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke fuch courage, and his enemies were fo difmaied, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie. This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman General flue the General

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereofonly Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and diverso ther Roman Captaines, especially Casar, 20 were better men of warre than any of these three; though they never offered up to Iv piten, Opima spairs; the Armour of a Generall slaine by themselves, when they were Generall, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victorie, Acerra was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all thatbelonged to the Cisalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citic it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and sertile Territorie possess by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting, Italie, so many as would not subject their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themseliues in 30 the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Theeues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed by the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it sanding alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the raigne of Yumas, nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augusus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene,
was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as farre, as their ambition
could reach.

Red, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad socuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuerthelesse bee slow and timorous as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be difcoursed of, in procuring allowance to his dessigne. This might suffice to disorder the whole Proiect. Wherfore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum; which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignitic of that Spanish Townes alliance with their 10 false friends. So should hee assaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Hauing thus concluded, he neverthelesse went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (faith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre again a Saguntum, but had been drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needefull to finish the conquest of the rest, before hee did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Oleades; and having belieged Althau (Livie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe 20

Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master, not only therof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first undertooke, being subdued, and the River of Evio.

But in the old winter at hand; he rested his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted description of liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

miss)neere the Spaine, in Ortelius, they are a A people of Caltile the old. of the Vaccei

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the "Faccai: and without found neere any great difficultie, wanne first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, b Ar-Tagus; andby bucala, by affault: though not without a long siege, and great difficultie. But in his SHIGHS, not tar from New Car- returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall judgement. For all such of the Vaccai, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoile of their Countrie, with those of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that 20 b Arbucala, or had escaped in the late ouer-throw, joyning themselves with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale. These foure nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer faw enemic, vpon whom he durst not give charge; were throughly. refolued, that his natural valour would at this time no lesse neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But he that makes himselse a bodie of Crystall, that all men may looke through him, and discerne all the parts of his disposition; makes himselse (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or 40 drive him. Wife men, though they have fingle hearts in al that is iust and vertuous: yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true. that this subtile Carthaginian, when he served vnder Ashubal, was, of al the men of marke in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may beseeme a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath fometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have beene found more fortunate, than wife. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diffemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River side, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multi- 50 tude, from their bankes of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in fuch fort, as Hannibal defired that they should; thrust themselves in suric and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie fide. But when Hannibal faw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the Riuer. These carrying a kind of Lance de gay, tharpe at both ends, which they held in the middest of the staffe; had such an advantage over the foot. that were in the Riuer, under their strokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they slew all those, (in a manner) without reliftance, which were alreadic entred into the water; and purfued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that fide the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excep-10 ted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceining the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadours to Rome, and bemoned themselves, as likely to fuffer that, which afterwards they fuffered indeede; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honorable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was alreadie besieged. Hereupon some cric out, that Warreshould be proclaymed by Land and Sca; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state 20 of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would give them, ere it were long, a more plaulible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose; yet would it bee in their power, to determine what they listed themselves. vpon the report of these Embassadours; and this their gravitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Liniereports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of finceritie lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena; and had conference with him, though such as 30 left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And furely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liuie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the couenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was fent voon none other pretence, than prevention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adjovning to Saguntum, and having many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly 40 among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, what socuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but fate downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more fecure, than he had formerly been, of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late yeresthey had beene wont. Neuerthelesse, hee was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions, not only because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie desire. They were glad 50 of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should therby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hastie to threaten, before they were readie to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharins, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: eitheir for that he found himselfe ouerfireightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an unthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perills, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Iles of Greece: against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and sei- to fed upon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun fooner, or rather if he had flaied fomewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the busines with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemie, and was vanquished. The Roman Conful, Emilius, was fent against him: who in seven daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum, and thereby brought fuch terror vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadors were sent from al places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to refift: which it might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and be- 20 flowed them in couert; prefenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty thips before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power iffued out against the Consul; and was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarqued himselfes leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberalitie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sate downe, cre Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discoraged, by reason of the braue fallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall received a dan. 30 gerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies ynable to moue. Neuerthelesse he was not vimindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raife certaine mousable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great & large breach was made, by the fall of diners Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot affault was given: but it was fo well fustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were purfued even to their own trenches and camp. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an 40 hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wear ie the townesmen with continual trauaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitic, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibalfor some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuere, & without al compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, filuer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would affigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with 50 them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselues vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, & faued the honor of their wives and daughters) daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did : by whom their wives and daughters were defloured before their faces; and all put to fword, that were about foureteene yeares of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and fell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselves vp like most wretched creating tures in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had to dying vnreuenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great Habit nibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the flaues, and other bootie, hee divided a mong his Souldiers; referuing some things of choice, wherewith to present his

10 friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre. These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their owne flownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they fent Embassadours againe to Carthage : demanding onely, Whether it were by generall confent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre upon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hercunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with mild words, was indeede more insolent then 20 the former. For in that, they only required inflice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was vrged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie! But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his owne counfaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs. it is not the question which the Romans ought to ask vs. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull, or unlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, if wee have done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luctatius the 30 Gonful, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended : but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betweene you and Aldrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught vs, how to answere that particular. For what source you found in the Treatic betweene vs and Luctatius, to your owne disaduantage, you cast it voon your Consuls presumption; as promifing those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the 40 same libertie may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which afdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and confent.

This was an impertinent answere, and little better then a mecre cauill. For Lu-Etatius the Consull, in his Treatic of peace with the Carthaginians, had expresly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to have dealt plainely; and to have alleaged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjurie the state of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open 50 warre. As for the Saguntinessit little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inferted their names into the Treatie of peace with Afdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Afdrubal, and all other businesse betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better then Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doe what locuer we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath which wee bane alreadie broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Livie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilear with defire of revenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinarie force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian 10 Senate moued the Roman Embailadours, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had been laide in the hollow therof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your Selfe have a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and Share it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolued to make warre, it was meerely triuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, have ever been maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustic sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There have beene few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwife understood the obligation of a Treatic, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best aduised have rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brifac, to surprise as ma- 30 ny places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip, the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire. that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilear, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his iourney into Spaine, had solemnely bound him by oath, to pursue them withimmortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiese, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caufed him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make 40 this vow: so that it was no maruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this fort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine ownepart, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselues enemies to the people of England.

HANNIBALtakes order for the defence of Spaine and Africke. His iournie into Italie.

CHAP. 2. S.2.

Arrebeing thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vo his fword, which hee had drawne against the Suguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the fecond Punick Warre; fecond to none, that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where hee licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Aldrabal, for the 20uernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troups of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thenceinto Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, hee transported into Africk thirteene thousand, eight hundred, and fiftic foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred flingers of the *Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand soot, al yong men, * 200 and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrifond 20 in Carthageit selfe, not so muchin regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies: whereof thirtie seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentic Elephants.

Hauing in this fort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he fent Difcouerers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrengan Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He ai fo fent Embaffadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, & to the Gaules, 30 to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, & discouerers, being returned with good fatisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past over the River of iberus, with an Armie confifting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued : and appointed Hanno (not that old enemie of his house, who late still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie often thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, fome of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that o-40 there might not also doc, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the journie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thoufand horse, he past the Pyrenees, and entred into Gaules. He found the Gaules that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to 50 keepe him from paffing ouer the water. But he was greatly affifted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Viuaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods. into the Countrie of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet fuch as remained, being delirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Countriemen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their owne flore of corne and cattaile wasted, by the long flay of fo great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the River; and lent him guides. When the vessells for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse: he fent Hanno, the some of Bomilear, vp the River : himselfe in the meane while midking countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares upon their owne fide, and Hannibal, at the fame time, paffing the River in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with fome difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruailously seared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffes of trees, and cover them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serve as a bridge, to and from another of the fame fort, but loofe, vpon which the beaits were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and over come both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piement and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; & from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbred by 20 the Savoians: and loft, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely affailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other fide. And whereas this journie ouer the Mountaines cost him sifteene dayes trauaile, he was every day, more or leffe, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receive them; with the affiftance and conduct of the Cifalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on : having no- 30 thing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and relistance.

3. III.

How the Romans in vaine sollicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cifalpine Gaules against the

He countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene follicited before, by the fame Roman Embaffadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. Thefa, as they were infruded by the Senate. Tooke Section in their many hours. they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way home-ward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at leaft, to diffwade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open affembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answere. With what face (saith 50 he)can yee Romans perswade vs to valew your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wife, than fo? For they, relying on your faith and promifed affiftance, have beene veterly rooted out, and destroied by the Carthaginians; whom they might else haue held their affured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answere for the rest of our Countriemen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesseat our handes: who are resoluted, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territoric: and withall greatly glorifying themselues, their ftrength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to scorne, and had hard-10 ly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by refifting Hannibals passage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made against vo? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deserved so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee fhould fet fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this unpleasing answere the Embassadours returned home: carrying no good newes, offriends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were Consederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Cifalpine Gaules gave hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed lberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonics, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given 30 to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flie to Modena: where they belieged them. The liege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in affaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and feemed defirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Holtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the 40 Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush

in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered, by fast running, a little village, but defencible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was haltily fent, to relieue the belieged, with one Legion, and fine thousand of the Roman affociates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too rash and hastie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-aduised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that To Carthage, which had almost feruilely endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so braue and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: refting fecure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred & threescore Quinqueremes, or Gallies, of fiue to an Oare; which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consult. made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and vsed such diligence. having the winde also favourable, as in five dayes he recovered Massilia. There hee was advertised, of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to have found busic yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Confuls arrivall: whereof he was neither glad, nor forry; as, not meaning to have to doe with him. Each of them fent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were 10 beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, having flaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew necre, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found affuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuerthelesse hee sentaway thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Aldrubal and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie, Hehimselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pifa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had beene beaten by 20 the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull journie.

ð. IIII.

Scipio the Roman Confulouer come by HANNIBALAt Ticinum. Both of the Roman Confuls beaten by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

I lue moneths Hamibal had spent in his tedious journie from Carthagera; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have beene only twenty thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse. Hamibal himfelfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter fumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodinus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembred by himselfe in 40 the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to have perished, by diseases, enemies, Rivers, and Mountaines; which mischieses had devoured, each, their seucrall (bares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he fought to winne the friendship of the Taurins, who lay agoodly City, next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitic. Wherefore he affaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile ferued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour name of Augu- places. So the Gaules, without more adoc, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many 50 fla Taurinorum. for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arrivall, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Kon man Confull was already gotten through the most defencible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approch: many fate still, for very feare, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for great ter feare, offered their feruice against the Carthaginians, whom neverthelesse they wilhed well to focede.

CHAP.3. S.4.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals halten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pania; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition: Hanni-10 balthinking it strange, that the Conful, whom he had left behind him on the other fide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipto admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaines, and the great foirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed. at Hannibals successe, and sudden arrivall. Whereforethey dispatched a Messenger in all hafte ynto Sempronius, the other Conful, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to vnderstand hereof : and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should for beare to profecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to saue Italie it selfe. According to this order, Sem-20 pronies fent off his Fleet from Lilybaum; with direction to land the Armie at Ariminum, a Port Towns not farre from Rauenna; quite another way from Carthage. whither he was making hafte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come fo neere, that fight they must, ere they could part afunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had:vnto which Hannibal added the R hetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, having beene no lesse miserably settered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their defire, than to be delinered from their miseries by any kind of present 20 death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were flaine, with condition being the Victor, to receive his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to yfe in fingle combats. Every one of these vnhappie men wished, that his owne lot might speede; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whole good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having 40 none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselues out of slauerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld these, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horseand armour; but cuen him also, who being slaine in fight, bad escaped that miferable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them; beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to line victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farremore grieuous) to line in a perpetual flauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Ri4-32

uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemics, must needes retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had even now praifed the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemics. On the contrarie, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to faue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necesfitie. (to which nothing feemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this fort did Hannibal, with one substantial argument, That there was no 10 meane betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (faith a great Captaine of France )la comodite de la retracte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retrait. doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio. on the other fide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge ouer the River of Ticinus, did not negled to vie the best arguments and reasons hee could to encourage the Armie he led:putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armic commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by 20 Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues. than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starued. as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be given vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selves may make judgement what daring they have now remaining, after fo many trausiles and miferies: fecing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven backe to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approch, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a leffe dishonour, to die there by frost famine, and precipita- 39 tion, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met : each being farre advanced before the groffe of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him fome light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approch one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes, to affilt them: himfelfe with his Roman men at armes, following softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselues 40 couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This not with standing, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as prefuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Confull vnmindfull to relieue them : their hardinesse deserving his aide; and the hastie flight of those that should haue flood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduentured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been eleft in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this refere, to a Ligurian flave. Whilest the Re- 50

mans were busied in helping their Consull; an vnexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give vpon the Romans in flanke, and to com-

passe them about, whilest he with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the fcattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter, and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowted : so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio faw his horse thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; hee thought it a point of wisdome, having lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the 10 tempest over-tooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner stole the retrait; and recovered the bridge over Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quando á, dubium videatur : tacitam miles arripiat fugam : fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be understood in this sort; If a Generall of an Armie, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Armie fearefull or wavering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retrait, than to abide the uncertaine enent of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the River; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towns, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their campe; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forfake him. They thought that now the long-defired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Aneroeftus, Britomarus, and the Geffates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and flue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Car-

20 thaginians, and prefented their feruice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteoully, and dismiss them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vie to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conful stale a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like case and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himfelfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the River 40 of Trebia, and faue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to travaile by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conful; incampes himselfe strongly upon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day, more & more of the Gaules fel to the Carthaginian fide; among who came in the Boil, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages; but now they deliner them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, 50 attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Ros mans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a defire of hastic reuenge, than any great forrow for their loss received; seeing that, in a manner, all their toot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Siell, await and is comming. He therefore hasted hither; and from thence hee marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls denised about that which remained to bee done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal: arrivall; the fortune of the late sight; and by what errour or misaduenture the Romans were therein soiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason to

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts: fought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the vi-Storie, which he had alreadie, in his imagination, certainely obtayned. He also feared the election of the new Confuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipie perswaded the contrarie; objecting the vnskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers: and withal gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians, those of them inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being alreadie revolted. 20 Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour, which he might otherwise cafily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, confishing in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leffe feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To turther the defire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complayned of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that 30 they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their fakes, and to fet them at libertie, he had vndertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to bee his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hercupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they resuled to joyne with Hanmioal. Scipio cared not much for this : he suspected their fallhood, and was affured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it flood with the honor of Rome, to preserve the Consederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therfore he sent out a thousand horse: which com- 40 ming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them beauy loaden cut many of them in pieces, and chaced the rest even into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armic was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for fo the Conful would have it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to try the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by 50 the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought him selfe how to helpe sorward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: Hee found in the hollow of a water-course, over-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Thereinto he cash his brother Mago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armic, after they had well warmed and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Conful. Earely in the morning, he had fent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse : to braue the enemic, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Semprentus was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely iffued out of his campe, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did so enteeble and coole their courages, as they 10 wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines : having of the one, fixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flankes of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants, when finally the whole Armic was vnawares prest in the Rearc, by Mago and his two 20 thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Ramans, by heapes, under the enemies swords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to bee recompenced with the losse that followed. The sirst was, that hee fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inseriour in horse, and withall thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-even grounds, and woodlands, would have beene of no vse. His second errour was, that he made no discoverie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossely over-reacht, and instruct, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his soot-men with emptie stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and stossie whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Armie tyred with travaile, to an enemie fresh and sed, since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generalitie of minde is but as an unprositable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armic, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginiam; who either perceived him not, because of the shewres; or 40 would not perceive him, because they were over-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, shying through the Countricthat was over-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by sewer, than could have made resistance, if the enemie had met with him. Neverthelesse horse to away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Confuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh Supply against Hannibal.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cifalpine Gaules into Hetruria. FLAMINIVS the Roman Conful flaine; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

He Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for service:

to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe 10 to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not the field to the field of the field o fuffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall alarmes; assayling divers places; taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Centlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably sed: those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation. That he therefore undertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the 20 oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and affistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in seare, lest he should make their Countrie the seate of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding voon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readic soone after to practise against him: but were in like fort detected. He was therefore glad to vie Perwigs of haire, and falle beards of divers colors, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Faine hee would have passed 30 the Apennines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolued to take his leave of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre necrer to the gates of Rome. So away hee went, having his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet fince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment. in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the 40 extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that journie. Neverthelesse to avoide the length of way, together with the refistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to have beene erected upon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vsc of one of his eyes; by the moystnesse of the airc, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recoursed the firms and fertile Plaines he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50 Roman Confuls.

C.Flaminius, and Cn. Seruiltus had of late beene chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Confulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be served to againe, vnleffe he quickly finished the warre. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by fayning fome religious impediment, should detaine him within the Citic, or find other bufinesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, renoked him by Embassadors: but 10 he neglected their injunction, and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Serulius came with the rest of the Armic. All the Countrie betweene Fefula and Arretium he put to fire and fword, even vnder the Confuls nofe; which was enough to make him ftirre, that would not have fitten still, though Hannibal had beene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath faid; Pays gafte vefte pas perdu; A wasted Countries not thereby lolt. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour 20 to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemie. Many advifed him (which had indeede beene best) to have patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare: faying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Cartbaginians went, burning downe al Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horse; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enlignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Enfigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falfe, Tullie makes a jeast : saying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (asgoing now to fight) having hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answere of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that 30 it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it; asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cause, are likely to re-

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire, which whilest the Consul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he purfued Hannibal so vnaduisedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all fides, (faue only where that great Lake of Perufia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make relistance. So was hee flaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carkasses of his Countrimen. About sixe thoufand of his men, that had the Vantgard, tooke courage as for the most part happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, reconcred the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and given charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they ceased to despaire, of saving their lines by slight. They stood still, in a could sweat, upon the Hill-top; hearing under them a terrible noise, but not dis-50 couering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discerne

the lamentable slaughter of their fellowes. But they staid not to lament it : for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For descryed they were, and Maharbal lent after them; who over-tooke them by night in a Village, which hee furrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring their armes, vpon his promise of their lines and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein hee taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith; and fitted them with a tricke of their owne. For if it were lawfull unto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde unto them what they lifted; if the Carthaginians must be fain to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, 10 belides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanis Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans. whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian Prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands : of which all that were not Romans, hee fet free without ranfome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their fakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans hee kept in straight prifon, and infetters; making them learne to eate hard meate. This was a good way to 20 breede in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the voke of flauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by fuccesse of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partifans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with source thousand Roman horse, drew necrevito the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruslius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but comming too late, hee increased only the misaduenture. Maharbal was imployed by Hannibal, 30 to intercept this companie, who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Seruslius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria: that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular lealousie, which perfwaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all 40 men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bin taken vp but the yeere before, by this fubtile Carthaginian; yet fuffered he himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be preuented by a new Conful, and ambitious of the fole honour of beating Hannibalin battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with Thame and loffe: elfe would be not, contrarie to all good advice, have beene so hafty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been econtinued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the fecond time, and have fearched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: 50 both which this new Conful Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Gouernment of France ten yeeres, Cafar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene every yeere a new Lieutenant ent, the would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in treland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernement, fitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But to it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothful ignorance; by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

VI.

How Q.F. ABIVS the Roman Dictator, lought to consume the force of HANNIBAL; by lingring warre. MINVIIVs, the Masser of the Horse, bonoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successeful attempting, advantures rashly upon HANNIBAL; and is like to perish with his Armie, but research of FABIVS.

Reatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than cuer did warre, fince Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him inadmiration, as one that 30 could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate : hee only fought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himfelfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witneffed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long beene out of vie, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Confuls, and scarcely subject vnto comptroll of the whole Cities Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Confuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were fo, that the Conful (if he flood vpon his 40 prerogatiue) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as having supreme authoritie, to give the Dignitic by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie, Novum factum, novum consilium expetit; Contrarie winds, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Liuie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and Liui. 150 gaue direction in this businesse of deuction; then must we believe, that those books of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an entill spirit. For it was ordayned, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as having not been rightly made before also that great Plaies should be vowed ynto Iupiter, and a Temple to Yenu; with other such trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds al waies from vehemencie of seare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sonnes returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for desence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly fet forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp 10 all the lhips about Rome, and Oslia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Armie, which Servilius the Conful had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vfed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation of whom he did put to the fword, all that were able to beare armes. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his dif- 20 cased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Having refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hathir) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine : he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sca towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had affaied Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie foundtrue at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter: and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. Iean a' Angeley. But Hannibal was more wife. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detaine him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer 40 fince they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans and such, as had no oftner seene the enemie, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from ftraggling too farre; and preserved the countrie from vtter spoile. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierie as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardife and feare. But all stirred not this well-aduised Commander. 50 For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifcretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It wasteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and

CHAP.2. S.6. the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall you the most rich and pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could be by any arguments be perswaded to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horfe, he alwaies kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hamibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on: and that the towns flood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though a-farre off; he resolved to rest his Armie, that was loaden with spoile, in some plentifull and affured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must paffe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head upon the Hills of Callito cula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might iffue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had already wasted, into places more aboundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would have bin directed vnto Cassinum. whence he might both affay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to preuent him. But his guide mif-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Cassinum to Cassinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wisdome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & wonne the victorie, without blowes, 20 But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight invention, vet feruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the country, hee had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemie. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a denice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fierie Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemics were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leffe 30 afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recoursed fure ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some flaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish: After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journie towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, for faken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none but the time passed idlely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the 40 Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by fubtiltie & ambush, which he thought himselfe wife enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so carnestly, as he was preferred by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthineffe to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollitic of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee held vindoubtedly his owne; the love of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to fauchim from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer fo hainoufly. Hannibal on the other fide was no leffe glad, that he should play with a more adventurous gamester. Therefore hee drew necre: and to prouoke the Romans, fent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that hee now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutus, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nee-rer neighbour. The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he 10 could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his ownemen, terrifichis enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes iffue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This advantage Minutius wifely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and fetting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, hee fent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no relistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans 20 tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meere weakenesse. which held him within his campe, & therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not relift their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Aldrubal came from Gerron with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuerthelesse hee did not such hurt, as hee had

For this peece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie. & more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he fent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recoursed 30 foirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done anything wifely, in all his Dictatorship: saving that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and searefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if hee 40 were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons enery one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he lift, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted beforchis eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee bath not chosen any new Consul all this 50 while; Seruilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so hee might bring him into enuic & suspition) & the Dictator giving him leave to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is cuen this: He would have the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and have the sole Government both of our Citic, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it voon one more worthy. But lest, in moung the people hereto, I should feeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor leffe necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

Снар. 2. §.6.

10 Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was leffe than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in paffing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the Propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignitie, whose great power had freed the State at seuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C.Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had beene Prætor, was glad of fuch an opportu-20 nitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew; by often brabblings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to give an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, searing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie : faying, that it grieued them to see the people doc well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernement; that they fought to 30 humble the Commons by pourtie, and to impourish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would foone confume enery poore mans liuing, and findehim other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wife: and fince they had found one, (this worthy Master of the horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deferts; and give him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so hee might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Conful, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius : and having 40 finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not becable to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; afking him at the first, in what fort he thought it best to divide their authoritie: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successively, for fome longer time, should command in chiefe. Febius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore divide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly plea-50 fed; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuerthelesse hee meant to doe his best; and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator.

Needfull it was (though Liuie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor ioy-

ned in Commission, but have each entire & absolute charge of his owne followers there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconucnience. Polybius neither findes fault with this diffunction; nor yet reports, that Fabius was vn willing to command in chiefe fucceffinely (as the two Confuls vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee faith that Minutius was very refractarie; and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupen referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces betweene them, as is faid before, or elfe to have command over all by courfe. This is likely to bee true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loofe from the 10 rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it:as if herein confished

the proofe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no leffe carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally de ired, could not long be wanting. The Countrielying betweene them was open and bare vet as fit for ambush, as could be wished : for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fine hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not 20 be discoucred. But left by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to feize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eies and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as hee got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest 30 the Romans desended themselves, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceining a farre off, into what extremitic his new Colleague had rashly thrown himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the diffrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himselse by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemie to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forth with submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to have beene saved. So from this time forwards, the 40 Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise asterwards, when he delinered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Consul had pursued in vainc a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed ouer into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, heereturned home by Sicil; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Conful, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

d. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthic Conful. Great forces levied against HANNIBAL. HANNIBALtaketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Canna. The new Confuls fet forth against HANNIBAL.

CHAP.3. S.7.

Ith little pleasure did they of the poorer fort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a greatouerthrow but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the flow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Elfe, what meant the Confuls to fit idle the whole winter, contrarie to all former custome; fince it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performanceras if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own

20 private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publique. This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his fuit for the Confulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Cominaltie were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinfman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place: in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stuck not to affirme, That Hannibal was drawn into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen: That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been ouer-20 throwns, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had al been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he comanded ouer al as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Conful the warre would never be brought to an end; That fuch of the Plebeians, as had long fince been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner fort, cuer fince themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well descruing of them. By such perswasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Teretius: to 40 the great vexatio of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therfore opposed him with al their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fel out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regrum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Confuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vie at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. Al the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted 50 themselues into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successively, by the space of flue daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet fo, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vie, when by death, or any casualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would have it, there necded no more, than to let slip fine daies, & then was all to begin anew by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to fue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselues to secke those Offices. But no deuice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius, One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthie man, seemed so manifest, 10 that when the People had vrged the bulinesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chofen Conful : in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hercvoon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had ftood for the place before; it was now though meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great fufficiencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Amilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to fland for the place; which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great busi- 20 nesse of the Common-wealth. For, not with standing his late good service; He, and M. Liuius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherin Liuius was condemned, and Emilius hardly escaped. But of this iniuftice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his fecond Confulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most gricuous losse; the other brauely winning in the most happic victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to have a 20 fight of Hannibal, whom he promifed to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, travailed more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainely boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuerthelesse, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armic which they were now leuying, they might find the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemic, and the Enemic well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the flanders, with which Terentius and his Adhe- 40 rents had burdened them. What number of men they raifed it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking voon Han-

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercinaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouisions: searing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might divert the warre from home. His gifts, and good advice were louingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octavilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that he should accordingly passe over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not eafily drawne into the field, and fitted for feruice. For besides these Armies of the Confuls, and that which went into Sicil; twentie fine thouland with L. Pollhumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went against the Gaules, to reclaime that Propince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They fent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who having been their 10 Subject, and rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was alreadic past. What answere they received, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not fent vnto them; and that Philip hencefoorth beganne to have an eve vpon them. little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifts that they were driven foone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little foeuer) would have beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

Whilft the Citie was builed in these cares, the old Consuls lay as necre vnto Hannibal, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many 20 skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other feruices, but was indeed the occasion, to draw on the miseric following. Hamibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannussum; and, that they might not be driven to turne aside for all necessaries, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Casse of Canna: for the town was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wanne; and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemics to want many needfull things, vnlesse they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the service of his horse: longer then the Romans, having so many mouthesto feed, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this missay when horfe: longer then the Komans, having to many moutness to feed, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand, how this Peece, taken by Hamibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuerthelesse, as swertened unto Seruilius, that hee should have patience yetawhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the season of the yere commodious to take the field; the two Confuls, with their armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnite: especially, when soener they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemie. For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made unto supiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and vistorie: which being performed; the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, & dismissed with friendly leauetaking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited to the very set willius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthie of ted you Amilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthie of this honor, or likely to do his countrieremarkable service. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnes, than the other was in dignitic. At the parting; Fabius the late Distator, is said to have exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimitic, not Pppp 2

onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follic of his fellow-Conful. The answere of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his countrie: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rathnesse to aduenture upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his owne Citizens.

Dissension betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL was upon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

Helenew Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakeness.

Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of seare, than of courage. Hee willed them to consider, not only now. their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no 20 lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; ving some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rathnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkenesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, de- 30 claring what advantages they had against the Enemie; and how destitute the Enemie was of those helps, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them : hee exhorted them to play the men, and doc their best. They were easily perswaded : for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Amilius was knowne to bee, they should easily prevaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, faue craft; which would not alwaies thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; nor that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, 40 hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby fought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Amilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them for beare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Conful Terentius: who was no leffe popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citic. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therfore Terentius, who hastned their desire 50 to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to have the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which sew are more dangerous; Dissensing

of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight : Amilius would fo too, but faid that it was not yet time; why? because the enemie mult shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places leffe fit for his horfe. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Harnest? This would (said Varro) sauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (faid Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to fend them away 10 in such baste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and befeeching him to flay. Nevertheleffe he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an unbidden guest gaue him but a rude well come and intertainement. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armature, fel vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whileft it was yet in march; but they were beaten off, not without loffe, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomly withdraw the Army out of that level ground; incamped upon the River Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces over the wa-20 ter, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. Hee neuer was more vn willing to fight, than at this prefent; because the ground served wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue toward Gergon, Canna, or fome other place, where his store lay, for want of necesfaries: whereof an Armie forraging the country, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Han-20 nibal had been driven; and of base courses that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (faith Liuie) but ten daies prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readie to forfake him, and runne ouer to the Roman fide. Yea Hannibal himfelfe was once youn the point, to have stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he refolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts 40 of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieued with the more carly haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deutee in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him vnto that, which hee most desired; cuen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious; It was not vncommendable in Liuie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and; where they did ill, to fay, That, without their owne great folly, they had done paffing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee faith; HANNIBAL de fug d in Galliam [dicitur] agit affe; HANNIBAL [is faid] to have bethought himfelfe of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more then a matter 50 of heare-fay; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe. it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needfull vinto his Armie, the Summer forgoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great haruch; since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no fmall part of the Romans provisions? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutinic for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Countrie, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoile: having left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemie; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who give it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from fedition, 10 thoughit were composed of fundrie Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, having not only pronounced, That which of his men focuer fought brauely with an Enemie, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnely protested and sworne, (befides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserve and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a sensesse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armic, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse? or how could hee bee trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he defire to liue; having betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his 20 miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therfore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a maner al his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne countrimen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honour of the victorie taken from the Enemie, and given vnto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on somestrange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily have wonne all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemie can hope to find in them another time in the T

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lie emcamped on the River Aufidus. Varrowas perswaded, that it concerned him in honor, to make good 30 his word vnto the people of Rome; and fince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vie his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to have disswaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needlesse bazard. Against whose wordes and substantial arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fel vpon the Romans that 40 were fetching water to the leffer Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to affaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of fuch courage, as promifed affured vi-Ctorie. When Amilius perceiued, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behind, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was leffe able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might therby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemics in the heate of fight. This done; the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armic to the leffer Cump, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, passed likewise oner, somewhat higher up the streame, which ranne from the South; leaving in his owne campe fo many, as he thought would ferue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bade them looke about them; and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did fo. And could you (faid he)pray for any greater fortune, than to joyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a levell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (faid he further) yeare first of all to thanke the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Vs, that have trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their lives, where they are fore to loofe them. As for these Romans. I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first but now vee may euenencourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men. whom ye have as often beaten as seene. Of one thing only I will put you in mindes That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to drive them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which yee haue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the 20 riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Romans

When he had said this; his brother Wage came to him, whom hee had sent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hamibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to have with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mage) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hamibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them never so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mage. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their so Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hamibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mage about many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mage and his Companions, than was Mage with beholding thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no less troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agineonry, made vnto our King Henrie the sist saying, that of the Frenchmen, to there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run the forest states of the principal are not the same of the same to the same

there were enow to bee killed; enow to bee taken prifoners; and enow torun away. Euen fuch words as thefe, or fuch pleafant jefts as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ferue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon fuch paffions, as muft gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceined the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might doe best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Ensans perdues; but when we yied our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those where with they had formerly ferued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these bee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vling long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitic, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and surious in giuing 10 charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leffe eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to give ground, when they were ouer-preffed, nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they faw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall 20 vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood sast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vtmost of their hardines, as knowing that the Enemie could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make agood retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Considence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to advance; leaving void the place wherein they had flood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should becouerhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, Hee made them as it 30 were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptie space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as seruing only to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthned & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to have beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I have seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the 40 last rancks of his long battalions, & in the head of his Reare, doubtles well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the Riuer Aufidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, under the command of Asarubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Liuie faith Mabarbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mage, had the leading of the Rearc. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was tenne thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and Hee, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armic was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found concenient against the Carthagmians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand saft compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselues. Thus much it seemes, that Terentins had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, for a smuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Affiftant; and in such cases it happens often, that wife men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horse-men, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Var to the 10 other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Servilius the former yeeres Conful, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Garthaginians having their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and flingers of the Bileares: Adrubal brake vpon the Conful Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of service on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way lest, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wher-20 fore they not only vsed their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from under them. fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driven by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Afdrubal, with his boifterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee relifted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make relistance. Wherefore 20 the two points of their battaile drew towards the midft , by whose aide, these Oppolites were forced to disband, and flie backe to their first place. This they did in great halte and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and follie pursued. Vponthe Africans, that flood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and for a fmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hanmbal with his Carthaginians was ready to reenforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had flood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside out-40 ward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne & broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissoluted. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deepely within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so farre, that getting beyond the R care of them, they 50 inclosed them, in a manner, behinde : and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least case. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it undifferenced, untill now. For it is agreed, that plut in vit. the Romans were thus empaled vnamares; and that they behaved themselves, as Hannib.

men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would have beene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of flaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to cscape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rathnesse of inferiour Captaines: but fince the Conful Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Astrubal, having broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed your them along the River side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which to were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, not with standing the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuerthelesse hee cheared up his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne front behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Conful received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt : and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he 20 was compelled, by wounds and weakeneffe, to for fake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Conful had given order fo to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in diffres. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceived this, and underflood that the Conful had willed his horse-men to dismount. He was very glad of it, and pleasantly faid, I hadrather he would have delivered them onto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was maruailously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and downe about that great fandy Plaine, raifed a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, 30 blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eyes & mouthes of the Romans. These, ving their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor fulfaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yetatthe first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were even ready to joyne; fine hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backes, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leafure to examine them; but caufed them, vnwcaponed as they were, to get them behind the Armic, where he bade 40 them rest quietly till all wasdone. These crafty adventures did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Vnder their Iackets they had short swords and ponyards: besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were flaine, and therewithall flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischiese, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine levell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight & resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Astrabal, having in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of A- 50 milius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, betweene the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned and gave

vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other fide: fo did it prognosticate a dismall florme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to fullaine; thought it the belt way, to avoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wife than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in striuing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to sustaine the impreffion alone, which he could not have endured with their affiliance. Now hee 10 found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought elle, excepting hafty flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Afarubal vnto the pursuit, as fittelt for that service. As drubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell ypon the backes of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner furrounded on all parts elfe. He brake them cafily; who before made ill refiftance, being inclosed, & laid at on every fide, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilest every one sought to avoide 20 those enemies, whom hee saw neerest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about £milius, got vp to horse, and saued themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeue it, than suppose that Liuie so reporteth, to grace therby his Historic with this following tale. CN. CORNELIVS LENTVLVS, galloping along by a place, where he faw the Conful litting all bloudied upon a stone entreated him to rise and saue himselfe ; offering him his assistance and horse. But PAVLVs refused it ; willing LENTVLVS to Shift for himselfe, and not to loose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe of that dayes losse. Further hee willed LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: willing 30 them to fortific Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling FABIVS, that Hee lived and died mindfull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (peraduenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will hee was drawne to that Battaile, or when bee beheld the first defeat of his Horse, at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he faid a good while before this; when he thought the Conful and his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Afdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth in which part, they first 40 of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Emilias therefore, who could not lit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and whileft the spaces were somewhat open, by which hee might have withdrawne himselfe; was now (had hee neuer so well beene mounted) vnable to flie, hausing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies as fell apace in that great Carnage. It fufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaile hee fought no lesse valiantly, than hee had warily before, both abstained himselfe, and disswaded his sellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was veterly loft, it had laine in his power to faue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that he either too much disease. 50 med himselse; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Vicount Lifle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, gricuously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbet was in the flowre of his youth, vnhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to for sake his father; who for esceing the loffe of the battaile, and not meaning to flame his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leave him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, faue two or three thousand, who (as Liuie faith) escaped into the leffer campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, 10 partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their defire, which they had well-necre done, the battaile was lost; and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded. having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming upon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, 20 retired into their campe, and held the Enemie bussed. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that faued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Conful recouered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companic. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvaile: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; fo that his necrest way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibals Armic, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needes be, that 30 when once he got out of fight, he turned vp fome by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of fuch as could not hold pace with the Conful, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or therabouts, were gathered up by the Namidians, & made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all sauce three hundred; who dispersed themselves in slight, as chance led them, and got into fundry Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, besides L. Amilius Paulus the Conful; two of the Roman Quaftors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, four fcore Senators, or fuch as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having beene Adiles, Pretors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. 40 Seruilius the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liuie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse: too few to have defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the same Linie saith, to have beene overcowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to give credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and faying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that thefe three thou fand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either flaine or fled. So 50 the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Conful Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gaules, sifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not fensible, in the joy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduifed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently been at an end. But he beleeved not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to vie.

è IX.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

Ot without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their transiles, than the truth of things, & information of posteritie; magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceeds dings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers confoript. No man of found judgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompense his junioritie, (such as it was) he produceth 20 substantiall arguments, to instific his owne Relation; and consuteth the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to have all men thinke better and more honourably than it descrued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that wee shall hereafter finde in others; and shall have cause to wish, that either they were fomewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Works of their opposite Writers were extant, that fo we might at least heare both sides speake; being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But fince this cannot be, we must be 20 sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probability. This attentiue circumspection is needfull euen at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration, of things following the Battaile of Canna. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Conful Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conful Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto those of Scipio at Cannussium. wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him:

40 rifen, that had bene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow, and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a maner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter enfuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

that these letters of the Conful were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly

When Hannibal had facked the Roman campe, and truffed up the spoiles, forth-50 with he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to for sake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towns that opened the gates vnto him, was Cosla, where he laid vp his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous loffes, fuffained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoyling the Countrie, especially the poorer fort of them, did hardly endure: but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesse (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto fuch of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but feeking indeede, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whileft all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by injuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage. should beare sourraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome; and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by fo much aduerfitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes prevailed nor, as shall be shewed in due 20 place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their loffes past, but entertained a deceivable hope. of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemics of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conjoyned, as were any saue the Latines. changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Province of Italie, if not (as some then 20 thought) of all the Earth: and the Citic of Capha, answerable vnto the Countrie. whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse convenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud : and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the majestic of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calanius an 40 ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering al popular defires: whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offred their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thra-(ymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journie into Campania; the Dictator Fabina waiting upon him. At that time, either the nerenes of the Roman Armie, or some other searc of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leifure to treat about any article of new Confederacie : or had leifure ferued, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vlage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any fuch negotiation, without aduice 50 of the Senate; which mainely impugned it. So they that had promifed to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobility, that should affure him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to fit still, in a great perplexitie :as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered them-selucs, to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenfed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, cassly pardoning their owne cowardize. The People holding so tender a regard of libertie, that cuen the lawfull Gouernement of Magistrates grieued them, with an imaginarie oppression; had now good cause to scare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them under a more streight subjection, than ever they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Councell, to about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of for faking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne themfelues with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmelesse: This he spake, as a man well known to be beloued himselfe by the People, and prinie vnto their designes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuerthelesse to deliuer them all, and to fer things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other affurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. 20 They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; Hee called the People to affembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knewe they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Gouernours were furprised by his policie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduited them, as a thing which necessitie required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearling vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Mul-20 titude, vnprouided for such an election, was filent; vntill at last, some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, basenesse, and infufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore helde vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilest more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, having beene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvitus entreated, and casily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleffe) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured 40 Parwins, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselues indebted, for saving all their lines. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canne, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so farre, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: faying, that all was loft; and that the Campans must now, Qqqqq 2

not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselues, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Inucctive against Hannibal & his Carthagintans : telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of flaughtered carkales, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with fuch other stuffe, as onely bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselves, He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot. and foure thousand horse; with monic, and all provisions, in aboundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in adventuring 10 to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, upon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should be subject vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themfelues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicel.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himfelse carnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong 20 Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were fending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded but most carnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to ent it in pieces, that, by fuch a notable piece of service, they might make amends vnto the

Aduertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection vnto any 30 Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: for bearing to attempt any further upon Naples; which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well prouided, to lay siege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe : all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the fight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainements; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it selfe, should bee driven to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who 40 openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State: and vie him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magins deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Mazius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the fonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at Supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him 50 from making any fuch attempt. All the Towne (belides) were so carnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are faid to have murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. No.la, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and deerra, were the Cities next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned as they were indeede though floutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Canne and the griefe of that 10 loffe was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the losse alreadie received, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to ftint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the ftreets were full. Courriers were fent forth, to bring affured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Conful Varro had throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was faid) from their fatall bookes, buried aliue two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them fuch instructions; we may justly thinke, that sibyl herselfe was instructed by the Deuill. Yet is it not 20 improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to barken to wicked Soothfavers; whose detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassadour was fent to Delphi, to confult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and fupplications they might pacific the gods, and obtaine an ende of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare; though not seruing to give remedie. At the same time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the 30 Iles Ægateis, which was in readinesse to set vpon Lilybeum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Conful, that he might name a Dictator, to take foueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessitic required. It must needes seeme strange, that all forts of people went forth to meet the Conful, & bid him welcome home, gining him thankes for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate : which therein (doubtlesse) prouided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people : what elfe would have 40 followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subject vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thankes; they noysed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the earcs of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remayning strength. This therefore was wifely done: But whereas Linie would have vs thinke, that it was done generoully, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fuluius had his life brought Lius 1.26; into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller To offence, M. lunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and

T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a thousand horse : though with much Lind, 22: difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These foure Legions, are elsewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only fet downe, that had beene enrolled in the beginning of the yeere for custodie of the Citie. Wherfore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Pratextati, or Stripplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie flaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should descrue it by manfull service. This not sufficing; The Dictator proclaimed, that who locuer ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith bee difcharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the 10 spoiles of their enemies that had beene there set vp : among which, were fixe thoufand Armours of the Gaules, that had beene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius. a little before the beginning of this Warre. To fuch mockeric had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their infolent oppressions, that they were taine to iffue forth of their own gates, in the habit of firangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canne, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citic, but commanded. whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territoric. To the meffengers of the captiues, audience was given by the Senate. They made car- 29 nest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then flood, ofable Souldiers, commending their fute; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to bee too tender of such as had yeelded to the Enemie; much was alleaged against these who now craved ransome: but the special point was; that they were wilfully loft, fince they might have faued them felues, as others did. It fufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Confuls: they were told, that this was great prefumption. The truth was, the 30 State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the difbursement; whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as wee find recorded. Neyther must wee regard it, that the flaues which were armed for the warre, are faid to have cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene seuere; when as indeed they were futeable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly. Hercofit is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the 40 price, whereat hee thought them current. But wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for flaues might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them ( when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would have given fuch long day of paiment; it is likely that the Romans would have beene his chapmen: but feeing he dealt only for ready monie, they chose rather to fav. We will not give, than, We cannot. The like aufteritic, vpon the same reason, but contrarie pretence, was vied toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great 50 Battaile. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might have done fo. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call raggione del Stato may ferue for an excuse: when the Common wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpeit selfe, by doing iniuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Steil; and there to serve, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeeres in the warres, or else were sisting yeeres of age; but vntill this warre should be ended, how long socuer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thristic censure, was afterwards laid vpon others, for their misbehauiour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitic, sauconly (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cacilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind sooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of segret a losse, were deuting, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibakas yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitie of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonatic: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People, neuer. Listle full:

theleffe it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault. M. Iunius the Dictator, having dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with five and twentiethou and men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campanta; where (as may be prefumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evill: for of any cuill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake cftate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Offia with a fleet, ready to fet faile for Si-20 cil, hauing one Legion aboord his ships, & fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp : with which forces he was to defend that liand, and doe what harme hee could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, hee fent these of his new Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched haftily with his Legion toward Cannussum: delivering the fleet empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, & chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campans) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by feeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great journies thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the E-20 nemie. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples : affaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloialtie: it had also a sure Hauen, whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustayning much inconvenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nolait was thought a valuable confideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were veterly vndone. So thought the Multitude : and fuch talke vled force, that had little feare of their owne private want or povertie, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a flout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of especiall marke, well beloued in the Citic, and one that had done 40 good service to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thankes he could vnto so courteous an Enemie. Mar cellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the same casie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deferued of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prator, who defired nothing more than fuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainement, being himselse also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius to far in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola; and assaicd, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answere, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back againe to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nolabore vnto him: who although they durft not ftirre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies affailing him without, like enough it feemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee fought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if 10 once Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemie. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly aduenture; even to finde him busied within the Citie, whileft the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and fend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking towards the Enemie: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had cuftomarily issued forth before more early cuery day, to skirmish. But when it was 20 further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that furely all was discourred, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the affault; which was done in all halle. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leffe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: finddenly the middle pate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the best and oldeft of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected sallie the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were fome of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like fort iffued they of the new-leuied Companies, 30 vpon the enemies backes. The fudden terrour was more availeable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was fo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauest Acts performed in all that warre; for afmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemics that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of 2 ola: condemning about threescore and ten of high Treason. whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdome to loose time in perswassions, but laid siege vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This ter- 40 rified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towne emptie: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemie so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It feemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Armie seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thoufand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden so cruption; witneffeth chiefly, in what great feare they flood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be delivered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not reliftlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the towns, and held it. Five hundred of the Pranestines there were, and aboue foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaile of Canna, being fent by their feuerall States to the campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great mislortune encountred them, and fent them backe for rowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernement they lived happily. So came they all, one after another to Castline, where they met and Itaied. Neither had they staied there long; 10 ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Prenestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at last they sew all the Townssmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemie. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Caliline were as the rest of the Campans, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancie in desence of the place witneffeth, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers affaults hee gave, but was still repelled with losse: and many fallies they made, with variable event. The Enemie mined; and they countermined; opposing so much industrie to his force, that he was driven to close them vo. and feeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Mafter of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the River: who faine would have relieved Caliline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouer-flowings of Vulturnus, the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of 30 the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported : but if the water staied his iournic. fuch entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome folong, as till extreme famine had confumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was loft, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floting downe the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discouered and preuented; Gracebus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly fustained the poore belieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatsocuer grew greene under the walls was gathered for fallets; the Carthaginians 40 ploughed up the ground: whereon the belieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Cafiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Compolition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ransome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casiline; as a Garrison for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he restored it. To the Pranefine Souldiers great thankes were given, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Praneste: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherin the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and confumed much of his time, that might other wise have beene better spent. For Winter over-tooke him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when hee was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

à. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be fent to HANNIBAL in Italie. 10 How by the malice of HANNO, and floth or parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

Hen Mago, the sonne of Amilear, had spent some time about the taking in of fuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal fent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victoric. 20 He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls

his brother had fought; what Confuls he had chaced, wounded, or flaine; how the flout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; that, not without reafon, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them about two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as already it was) 30 Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He saidit was even at an end, if they would now purfue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie; that so many Battailes had much diminished his brothers Armic : that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: 49 reports it: and which the victoric would require with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels. poore, the bra- or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitic, for a smuch as none but the * principall not altogether of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Whoso considers the former Punick Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage neuer did receive, in all the durance thereof, any fuch hopefull advertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinarie welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy. Himileo, a Senator 50 adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should bee yeelded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thankes un-Roman Equites. to the gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

Hanno made the same formall answere, which Liute puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow received at the Ilands Leateis: vet the summe of his speech appeares to have beene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe for a fmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthave. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported faying, It ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for 10 more helpe, as if he had beene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled for footh with spoile, to make request for meat and monic. To these cauills, if anfwere were needfull, it might be faid, That other bootie than of horses and slaues: little was to be found in the Roman campe : the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few aliluer stude in the bridles and trappings of a Liu.Lizza their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine convoy of mony and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards faid to have done, when they wanne the campe of Afdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journie towards Italie) then might such an objection more justly have beene made vnto his demand of a supply. 20 But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswafion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to feeke peace, whileft they had fo much the better in warre. What would have beene the issue of this counsaile, if it had beene followed. it were not casie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have beene kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submiffiue behauiour could preserue Carthage from ruine, longer 30 than vntill fuch time, as Rome was at leifure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeede very pestilent;

and ferued only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine confent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Numidians, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of filter, should bee sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twentie thousand foot, and soure thousand horse, should be leuied in Spaine; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Prouince. but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully fent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to taxe the rechlesse improvidence of 40 Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannato Rome, or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would have finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to bee imploied in the following warre. But either the too much carelefnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vponthe private humours of men, that had more feeling of their ownecommoditie, than sense of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the 50 order that had beene so well set downe. monie peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and fourethousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had beene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. fome small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journie of Afdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked o' but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had

Heere wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie. both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, fince the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidioustyrannie of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much monie, as was to bee disbursed for re- to deeming of peace, after the loffe at Egateis. Yet we fee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, belides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italic, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of mony in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other fide, having three or foure veeres together beene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, even for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthy merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, cuen from Tvrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground; and received their Tributes 20 from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come. that the hatred of Rome found leifure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fallhood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, having giuen vo hostages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe what soener should bee enjoyned them, with condition that their Citie might not bee destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citic of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt with all, but 30 the Towne must needes be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which ye now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholsome kind of life. and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shewes, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hastie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter what soener it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroied; Hee may seeme, 40 not only to have had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there here had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, & the great height whervnto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not beene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: having every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had beene re- 50 quisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couctous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Encmies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Gouernment of an ambitions man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could fo doc) finished the warre, might casily make * Hannibala King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had gi-bition Hanno uen them to the conquest of Rome. By fuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne flackneffe, incredulitie, fed Hannihal By such maticious working of Hanno, and by their owne flacknesse, incredistite, see authors, but dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were persuaded rather to make small diffunde ware bursements in Spaine, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed that so hee impossible, to hold a Countrie of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of might line compassed 10 Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemic : especially the affection of the Natu- with Legions, to make a running warre, by which the Romans might have beene found occupied, make himselfe enen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. a King Liu. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the profecution of their maine intendment lib. 11. against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as every little thorne were pulled out of the fides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporie have bin besieged & forced: which by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; ha-20 uing not about four hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not ouer-much trufted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporia, that was, befides the proper strength, like to be so well affisted by the Masslians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would have been a worke of little lesse difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the feat of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being such as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much 30 troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spaine : whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For even so the Romans afterwardes removed Hannibal into Africk, by fending an Armic to Carthage; & by taking the like course, they now endeuoured to change the feat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they fet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were wel enough contented to harken vnto his discourses, as long 40 as they were plaufible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amiltar, to wearie themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely affifted ; as if the industrie of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre leffe honourable than the people of Rome: not only in gouernement of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike aboue their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimonie vsed toward their own Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with 50 feeling fighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victorie at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let paffe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe.

For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Linie, the tender love of his owne Country, which made him give credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his fake, belocue those lies, which the vnpartiall judgement of Polybius hath condemned in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needleffe to re-

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before ASDRVBAL the sonne of AMILCAR followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

CHAP.3. S.II.

Thath beene shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conful, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his difcent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse.

had been ealotted vnto this Conful, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Han-10 nibal: who fince he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleeved, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number backe with him, fending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publiss himselfe remayned in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsulinto Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies. The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, som what maruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, & with-drew from 20 their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we have cause to wonder, how the Enemie could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannie of Carthage, might casily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours might serue to arme the Naturalls against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans. were it onely by the memorie of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raised souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstie Na-30 tions. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or seruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durft be bold to fay it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither fo many, nor fo great, as they are set out by Liuie. This we may be bold to fay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Linie in his person, maketh an obiection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth anfwer, That if ASDRVBAL were vanquished, as SCIPIO would say, by him in Spaine: Liu lib as strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Afdrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape 40 out of a battaile, saue only by the steepe descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer

Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italie, vpon which he fell with more than threefcore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs wel together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent al his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemie: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the last battaile betweene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherfore we can no more than be forry, that 50 all Ca thaginian records of this warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being veterly loft, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to give too much credit. In this regard, I will sum-

Contrarie hereunto we finde in the life of AMILCAR, set downe by Emilius Pro. bus. That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These wordes. being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their General infuling such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberall. For in the treatie of peace betweene Amilear and Catalias, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes. and for fake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilear boldly bade him choose, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the 20 Armes, which his Countrie had put into his hands to vie against her Enemics, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilear have his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man confumed with miseries; as Fabius would have him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; faying, that how locuer Amilear, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference 30 betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part that how source Livie introduceth Hanno in one * Agateis In- place, joyning very foolithly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands, * Agasulas, er scemq; teis, with the great services of Amelear at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like eponite, oc. Liu. vent; yet elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappie conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him fay, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, 40 that this Fabine, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all 3 or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are fuch as follow.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Hauen-towne, not farre within the Pyrences. retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the same of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become subject vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could easily beleeue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemencie, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and having no iurisdiction in the Countrie. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man verie courteous, and one that could well infinuate himselfe into the love of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practice had the better successe, for that hee feemed to have none other errand, than fetting them at libertie. This pretext availed with some others were to be hired with monie: and some hee compelled to 10 yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno, Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindely) uphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: vet implied it indeed an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romana; of the Roman iurifdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipiolanded, was newly subdued by 20 Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more casily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouernor over them, as over the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalitie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires, ) He made him not only Lieutenant generall over them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leaving them to be governed 30 by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of al conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselues indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the prefent euil which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to avoide it. This bad affection of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his 40 Province. Therefore he adventured a battaile with Scipio; wherein he was overthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio besieged Stissum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Afdrubal having passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, fel vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a vi-Storie, rouing abroad in the Countrie; and with great flaughter draue them aboord their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrie, where he with drew the 11lergetes from the Roman partie, though they had given hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane scason was gone to visit and aide his fleet: where having set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Afarubal; who durst not abide his comming, but with drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia their chiefe Citic, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirtie dayes; hoping invaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacie; they were amerced twentie Talents of illure. During the slege, the Lacetanicame to helpe their distressed heighbours; and were beaten home by Seipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Seipio, should without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it strange, that all the Sea-coast Nothward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarially distinuic Romans: (labiest anta Rome, should in continuance of the Storie, after a

10 ly dittonis Romana; subject vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Storie, after a Lin, 100-210 few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeue, that Astrobal, as it were by a charme, stirred up the litergetes, making them lay asside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; while thimselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too starre into the Countrey, was beaten by Astrobal back to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, until Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning upon them, unlooked for, through a deep snow. As for the Lacetani, silergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they sought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians, and contrariwise, vpon sense of iniuries received, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, under which they seared to be brought by these new Masters, hatking againe unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their owne Countrey Lawes, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may restince: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Casar; till when they were never throughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victoric against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victoric, aboue one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettie Estates, in Spaine, are said to have submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and given Hostages: whereby Asarubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though having eafily vanquilhed the Illergetes) went 40 not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects and had given him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes, wherein they slue fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke soure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren ioyntly administred the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did, haud einetanter; without feare or doubt, passed over therms, & besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had alreadie subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asarubal. Bostar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselie to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrie; was by freely restoring vitto them their Hostages; as resting; without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crastic Spaniard, being trusted with this mellageand restitution of the Hostages, carried them Reference.

all to the Roman Generalls: perswading them, as hee had done Bostar, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much love: if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward and cre this we finde, that all the Spam/b Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearing so many particularities, whereof I can beleeue so few. But since wee finde no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The vecre following was like vnto this: Astrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Aldrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and fine hundred horse out of Africk: He repaires his fleet; and prouides every way to make resi- 10 stance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt vnto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last yeers for their negligence, which had betraied the Nauie. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischiefe, so that As drubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly affaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laide vp all his prouisions; and shortly make themselues Masters of the Countrie round 20 about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearely pay. Afdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Asdrubal should leade his Armie forthwith into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had been einformed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had fo weakely supplyed him, as is shewed before. But thus we findeit reported: and that you the very rumour of this his journie, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. As drubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be fo: or, if they will needes have it fo, that then they must fend him a Success- 30 four, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to imploy they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse: Adrubal must needes be gone; and Himileo, with fuch forces as are thought expedient for that service both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherfore Adambal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of monie, that hee might have where with all to winne the friendship of the Gaules; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can bee no better, he laies great Impositions upon al the Spaniards his subjects: & having gotten toge- 40 ther as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth, toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege lbera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Afdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily. for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are flaine; and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were throughly ioyned. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionleffe) they are maruailoufly enriched; all the monie that could bee raked together 50 in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes event ioynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie stood in doubt before; and puts Aldrubal so farre from all thought of travailing into Italie, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exployts advertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to fullaine their Liu.l.23. Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; fo as vnleffe they may bee supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Pronince. These Letters come to Rome in an cuill season; the State being scarcely able, after the loffe at Canna, to helpe it felte at home. Yet reliefe is fent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the R elation of things whereof the truth is leffe questionable. At the comming of to this supply the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke; that remember the latt newes of him, and how fearefully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilear the sonne of Bomilear, with an Armie of three core thou fand men, belieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, & others, probably conjecture to have stood, where Carinnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Iulig, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergetes their neerest Neighbours, for hauing repolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Encmies camps, with terrible flaughter of all that refift them: and having victuailed the 20 place, encourage the townsmento defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the beliegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about fixteen thousand against threescore thousand; and killing more of the Liudes enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, enery one, out of his quarter; and tooke that day, belides prisoners and other bootie, siftie and eight Ensignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten berus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them: fince Asarubal was lately driven to poll the Coun-30 trie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this journie, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howfoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them aboue thirteene thousand slaine, & aboue three Liu.1.23; thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine tell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could from Illiturgi, fall ypon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of I-

Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Linie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large accesse of Dominion, winter on their 40 owne fide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spamiards rife against Afdrubal; and are overthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum; famous by the death of the great Amilear, P. Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuailes, being strong and defencible; as intending to make it his feat for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some stragglers; or such as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they have cut off two thouland of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pub-50 withdrawes himselfe vnto Mons Victoria: that riling somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-lookes the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Afdrubal the sonne of Geseo, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places the rabouts, is discourred by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himfelfe to an high peece of ground; where they beliege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Caffulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre difrom them, and feated on the head of the River Betis. Nevertheleffe the Carthaginians passe ouer iberus, to besiege Illiturgiagaine, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winneit by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Callulo, yea and the Roman Armie lying to close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grieuously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe; and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboue twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirtie Enlignes. This victorie (doubtleffe) is remarkeable : confidering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians beliege Bigarra: but that fiege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thou- 20 fand prisoners taken, and seuen and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipso in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set warre on foot quickly fill vp the broken troupes of Asdrubal: who having also hired some of the Gaules, aduentures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thouland of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed, to leave Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of 30 that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recoursed it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now belieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for having so long forborne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; 40 and wherin we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them. if they had beene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their brave exploits, wee can perceive none, than this recoverie of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journie; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Hauen towne, built and peopled by a Colonic of the Phoceans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They have casily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniar ds, that are carried one while by perswasion, other 50 whiles by force, and fometimes by their owne vnfettled paffions; and now finally they have wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may eafily beleeve, that when they tooke Sagantum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like fort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after cuery one of which Astrabal sate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanguished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortific themselves within their owne places of ftrength, and therein to attend the leuie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Saguntum, 10 they would not have confumed a whole yeere following, in practifing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little leffe than two yeeres businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they have yeelded vp themselues vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceine; vnlesse perhaps in those dayes it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Line followes, to call every Messenger, or straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage

of the Historie of the World.

20 of that people from whom he came. The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, fend an Armie of thirtie thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittell men are chofen and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countrimen that follow Hannibalin his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him fuch newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leffe vnwilling to follow Afdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probability, when these Mercinarie Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, prefuming on this accesse of strength, divide their forces,

30 and fecke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies, Aldrubal, the fonne of Amilear, is neerest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroicd; Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gifco, hearing the newes, will make vie of their distance, which is fine daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrie, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publics therefore must make the more hastic, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie, leauing the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer journie to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Astrubal the sonne of 40 Gifeo, are not fludying how to runne away: they finde no fuch necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him to hardly, that he is driven to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherin he thinkes himselfe not well affured. Especially he is vexed by Masanessa, Prince of the Massassi, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suessciani; to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and belieged, He iffues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leaving T. Fonteius his

10 Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis: but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues fo long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to have bin ignorant of his departure and fall vpon the Romans on all fides: neither are the Carthiginians farre behinde; but come so sast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncer-

taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is struck through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipto within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Afdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercinaries all for sake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrie. If Anitorgis, where Afdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it ; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly belocue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and casily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lines. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to flay them; and no leffe vnable, without 10 their helpe, either to relist the Enemie, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keepes his men together. Afdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Afdrubal the sonne of Gefco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouer taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where growes not so much as a shrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallifado. Thefe weake defences the Carthaginians foone teare in funder: and breaking 20 in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that faving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before faid. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they fay, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as affoorded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and shrowd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North fide of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life, since his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long fafe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit : who ha- 30 uing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, & drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteinus the Licutenant; as well they may. For Asdrubal, the some of Gesco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius fo encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately flaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retrait: referuing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately van- 40 quished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps dugard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure as if no enemie were neere. Martius therefore animates his fouldiers with lively wordes; and tells them, That there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of service. So he leades them forth by night, and steales vpon the campe of Askrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without relistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; fo that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know 50 not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke voon it, and runne away toward the campe of Aldrubal the sonne of Amilear, that lay fixe miles off. But Martins hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede; He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman thields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He drives head-long into flight, all that can fave themselves from the fury of the fword. Thirtie feuen thouland of the enemies periffi in this to nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, that are taken prisoners. Hercunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand flaine; and that in another battaile with Astrubal, there were flaine tenne thousand more; besides source thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath elsewhere well obserued. That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his fouldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Linie reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit : and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name, which he might well doe, if with fo small forces, and in 30 fuch distresse, He could clearely get off from the Enemies, and give themany parting blow, though it were farre leffe than that which is here fet downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martins sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good feruice, what soeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings, than the case required : and therefore tooke such carefull order, for Supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies, leuied to ferue in that Province, could be fent away; yet would they not flay a tide for defence of the Citie it felfe, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had affumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about fixe thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Italie, and affoorded meanes of fending abroad fuch a strong supply: otherwise. the victories of Martius would ill have ferued, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to 40 stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius. landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius & Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the overthrowes received. than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was for faken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not easily bee deuised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Aldrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Aufetani, neete enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no iffue, but only through a fireight, whereon the Roman feized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incampe in such a place, I

50 doe not finde : and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said. That Afdrabal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Province to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many daies, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this businesse, That night by night hee conucied his foot men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally raking advantage of a missie day, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants. leaning his campe emptie. If we confider, that there were at the fame time, befides this Aldrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for fo great a Countrie, with one of these three Chiestaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night: the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke missie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherin the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to to have beene of farre leffe value. Howfoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought elfe that the Romans could doe, served to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the old which they had loft. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their Election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not fo well. Some fuch occasion may have moved them to defire a Proconful, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publiss, likely to doe good, were it reviued in one of the same Familie. Whether upon these. or you other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the 20 fonne of P. Scipio fent Proconful into Spaine.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie, and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie: How he yied to walke alone in the Capitollias one that had some fecret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must have beene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himselfe) was thought to have conversed with his 30 Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answeres; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed otheir Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of viquestionable truth. That when a Proconful was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principal Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge . That the People of Rome were much assonished thereat . That 40 when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citic flood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about source and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be seene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vp. on him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martins no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the searc of all the Roman Captaines. who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Afdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly

P. Scipio was fent Proconsul into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousaud foot, and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emperia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipios arrivall, it is faid, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Pronjace: which he entertained with fuch a majestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and fo much the greater was their feare, by how much the leffe they could give any reason of it. If wee must beleeue this, then must wee needs beleeue, that their teare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the same of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winterfollowing (or as some to thinke, all the next yeere) heedid nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, intreating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fine and twentiethousand foot, and two thousand fine hundred horses, his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee affailed the Towne by Land and Sca; and wanne it by affault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discouered vnto Scipio, a secret pasfage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselues were either ignorant, or 20 thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Carthaze, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpona demi-Iland. betweenean Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding in some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Supio thrust thereinto fome Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the wals without relistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the natural litrength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; casily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found 30 within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainely affirme; but is faine to sav. That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasurie, we may easily perceive, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africke and Spaine, was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with fingular courtefie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupona Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North fide of Iberus, 40 for sooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended, for that he did not vant himfelfe, as commonly fugitives vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthagenians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vnsuretoken, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) for saken the Carthaginian partie, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing have beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, 50 when he should have rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that how socuer thetwoelder Scipios had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by ftrength; yet were the Romans neuer Mafters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in fending them home, wanne vnto himselfe the affured love and affinance of these Princes. The Carthagunian Generalls, when they heard of this folle, were very sorrie: yet neverthelesse they set a good saccon the matter; saying, That a young man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too sarre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a mote convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture: I should bee bold to save That the Carthiginians were at this time busie, in setting foorth towards Italie; and that Scipio, to divert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vp- 10 on the like occasion, sate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had beene vndiscouered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good iffue vpon the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asarabal should bee staied from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Astrabal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilest the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilear, 20 went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in triallof the Empire. But the Roman Hiflorians tell this after another fathion; and fay, That Afdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither heran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, fay they, comming vpon Afdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged so lustily the Caribaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches : and made it apparent, even by that small peece of sernice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemie. Afdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a River, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of accesse on the forefide; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On 20 the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe : and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine, into which he descended, more voon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Armie to the hazard of a bittell, for which this was-no equall ground. But such advantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climed up the Hill to him; they recourred even footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hilltop: whither although the afcent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approch; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their 40 way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is faid, that there was no way to flie. Out of fuch a battell, wherein he loft eight thousand men, As drubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to have marched towards the Pyrences, having fent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuertheles, Mago. and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, have too long detained vs. 50

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raifed in all quarters, to the Cittic of Rome.
POSTHVMIVS the Roman Generall, with his whole Armie, is flaine by the Gaules.
PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans toyning with the Ætolians, make warre upon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

Eleft Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates reioyced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of fuch mightie aide, as was decreed to be fent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Ram maccome into his own barnes and to drive away their thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his own barnes, and to drive away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affoording him little other profit, then fustenance for his Armie; by making him Maker of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd some walled Townes, in like fort as he did Gerjon, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the 20 hunger, that his Armie must have endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would have grieuously punished him for such imploiment of the Summer. This may have beene the reason, why hee forbore to aduenture vpon Rome after his victorie at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carrie the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battell: if being, either for w .nt of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repeiled (as might feeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had presented himselfe vnto 30 them with a leffened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was paft, when so many States of Italie were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was paffed ouer joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to fecond the welcom report of those mightie forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on : and of the promifed supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we find, that af-40 ter this he had aboue thirtie of them; whereas all, saue one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had been lost in his journey through the marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischieses the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the maine ftrength of the r Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receive the fleete that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and

Hauen, to receive the fleete that thould carrie inten a number of Men, rich; and 50 Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hamibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere served. Hee tooke the field: and having sinished what rested to be done at Cassistam, sought to make himself Master of some good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian sleet; or take from his Stiff 2. Enemies

Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the fame purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilto vnto the Locrians. and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to affay al quarters of Italia, yea, the Iles of Sicil and Sardinia; fince the flege of Rome must needes bee deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who flue aboue two thousand of his men; with the losse of sewer. than three hundred Romans. But Himileo sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians. his good friends, hee wanne Petellia or Petellia by force; after it had held out some moneths. Hee wanne likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Alfothe Citie of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto 10 him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Towne of Rhegium, ouer-againft Sicil.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthic to be recorded, as a notable testimonic of the good government, under which the Roman fubjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campans, and others, whose carnelinesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignetic, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did fend to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers received answere from the Senate. That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieve their Affociates 20 that were fo farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely fent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a priuate jurisdiction within themselues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly befought the Fathers, not to give them away: promiting to doe and fuffer what foeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to confultation againe: and having throughly confidered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to gipe any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safetie, as having alreadie discharged their faith to the vtmost. All this not with standing, the Petilians (as was faid) held out 30 fome moneths; and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victoric over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants. The Romans at this time were indeede in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canna; they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them fo neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Pretor they had fent, with an Armie of fine and twentiethousand, into Gaule; 40 to the Illyrian King Pineus they had fent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had fent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futeable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Armic was cut in peeces by the Gaules, in such fort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming the Enemies had sawed the Trees so farre, that a little force would serve to cast them downe. When there- 50 fore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How this tedious worke, of fawing so many Trees, could take defired effect, and neither bee perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the denice was subject; I doe not well conceine. Yet some such thing may have beene done; and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies fword. It is not perhaps worthie to be omitted, as a monument of the fauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now so civill, was infected in elder times. That of Pollhumius his skull, being cleanfed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and confecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy 10 veffell, for the vie of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leffe than the calamitie. But forrow could give no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who raigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt vpon eucn tearmes; entreating their affiftance against Philip and Perfeus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having affured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, Heesent Embassadours to Hannibal: with 20 whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, affilt the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the spoile therein to bee gotten, should bee left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there asfist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing semblably vnto him the full possession of that Countrie and the Iles adjoyning. But fuch predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly comptrolled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes It felfe not (as Herodotus falfly termes it, and like an Atheift) envious or malicious, 30 but very just and majesticall; in vp-holding that vnspeakable greatnesse of Soue-raignetie, by which Is rules the whole World, and all that therein is. The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their iournie towards Hamnibal: and being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, faying, That they were fent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly feasted; and friendly dismissed, with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to avoide the Carthaeinians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iournic, fell wilfully into the 40 Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better falhion; and concluded the bufinesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returnehomeward, they happened againe vuluckily to bee descried by the Roman fleete; which, mistrusting them to bee of the Carthaginian partie, gaue them chace. They did their best to have escaped: but being over-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it againe, That having been sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betweene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had fignified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: 50 and (which marred all) Gifco, Boftar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were fent with them from Hannibal to ratific the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition served to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent SIIII 3

close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest fold for bond-flaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some loffe of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavie weight this Macestonian warre, in an cuill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and suteable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beaten upon them from Spaine. They judged it more case, with small 10 forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Maceclon, joining with Hannibal in fuch a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegeance not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but even of the Roman Colonies that held all priviledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following fuccesse of things. M Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to fet on foot some commotion in Greece: or to nourish the troubles alreadic therein begunne. Philip was busic about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, fetting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Orienm; which he wanne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epi- 20 rots craued helpe of M.Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsfmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, under Newius Crispus, an under-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great saughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, & raise the siege. The King purposed (asit is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleete from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the River; 20 fo that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Atolians, a National waies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon; and eafily perfwaded them (being so affected as hath elsewhere beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promifed them great affiftance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as if already it had beene his owne. So a league was made betweene them : and afterward folemnely published at Olympia, by the Atolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Atolia to Corcyra, 40 in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and lest upon the Atolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Atolians made peace with Philip, it shuld be with Provision, to hold no longer, than whilest he abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promifed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Atolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedamonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which raigned at Pergamus, in 50 Asia the lesse, a Prince hereaster much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they fought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse of the Historie of the World. CHAP.3. S.II. reachnesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Atolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henrie the fourth, when he had only the title of Nauarre, was faid to court the Majors of Rechel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherevnto the Etolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Iliprians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricim and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessale, whence hee made 10 shew as if he would inuade Etolia. By the same of this Expedition, Hethought to flirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, against the Atolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Etolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perfeus, his sonne & heire, with foure thousand men, vpontheir borders : with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him. He made a long journie into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Maceden, when soeuer the King was absent. The Liolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Aca manians, in hope to fubdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee should bee able to returne. Hereto it 20 much availed, that the Remans had alreadie taken Oeniade and Navos, Acarnanian Townes, conveniently fituated to let in an Armie; and configned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the flout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) enery Mothers sonne of them, in desence of their Countrie; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who laied aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Atolians to forfake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given ouer, the Romans and Atolians fell vpon Anticyre, which they tooke: the Romans affailing it by Sea, the Atolians by Land. The Atolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consulat Rome; and P. Sulpicius 30 fent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asia came ouer to affish the Atolians. He was chiefly moued, by his owne jealousic of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Atolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which attalus and the Romans had fent, being joyned with the maine power of Atolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him, and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embaffadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable 40 conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testific, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but seare of being belieged in their owne Townes, that had made them delirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrusta Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupattus, wasted the Countrie in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in haste from the Neman Games (which he was then celebrating) and fending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Nauie into Greece, to affift the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthagimans: and vpon greater reason; as being more interessed in the successe of his affaires. Philip wastoo weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the Vessels were such as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vie the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning upon any part of Greece: than afterwards it could serue to drive them out. when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrie. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in affailing their Towne, Hee was encountred by the Etolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in 10 his retrait from Elis: rather he had given testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine under him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of fafetie, as they thought, when their Countrie was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sieven, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the falhion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an £tolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well known, and the tale beleeved. All Macedon therefore was in an vprore: and not onely 20 the Borderers, readic to fall vpon the Countrie, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselues a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leaving not three thousand men, to affist his friends the Achaans. He also tooke order, to have Beacons erected; that might give him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubea, where one Plator betraied to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to have beene lost, if hee had not comethe sooner. 20 He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Eubæa, Attalus had wonne more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vied. Now because the Roman fouldiers had defrauded him in the fack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the suddentidings of Philips arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-fide, where he got aboord his ships; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misaduenture; or tidings of Prusias the Bithymian his invasion vpon the Kingdome of 40 Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Etolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedamon, had beene busic in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was retur-

The Lacedamonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conforme themselues to their old manner of Gouernement. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redreffing things within the Citie, proued no leffe vnfortunate, than had beene 50 their attempts of recouring a large Dominion abroad. Lycurgus a Tyrant rose vp among them : vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Etolian and Roman side, for feare of the Acheans; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedamonian. But of these wee shall

CHAP.2. S.11.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of affurance to that Countrie; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, faying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opiss, and now into schaia: but could no where finde them, fuch hafte they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He said, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee fundrie times had done, and still to their to losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation fome Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymaans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and fold for flaues, He fought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, Hee fell vpon the £tolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leave of the Acheans: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants: and animated them fo well, that they rested searclesse of any threatning 20 danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuerthcleffe he was not fo farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himselse Master of the Sea; the Romans ( since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them

This good successeadded much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Atolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceiued against their Consederates; or some seare of danger at home, when Aldrubal was ready to fall vpon Italie; caused them to giue

- 30 ouer the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Etolians therfore, being driven to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and acceptit, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fine Gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Etolia, hee turned a lide to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would work wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battaile: but herefused it : and suffering the Macedenians to waste the Country round about, before his eies, kept himself close with-40 in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouercures of peace : which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the
- Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euill part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italie, and ashist them in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requitall: they had not fent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolsan Pyracies. Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last journie into Achara. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending feare of 50 being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durft
- boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to have beene one of Hanne histricks; whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder

Hannibal, and required the affiltance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at pleasure. Therefore he had reafon, fuch as Enuice could fuggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thriftie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres fo mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promites of fending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it ferue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to fend part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should to the Roman Armies be leffened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the profecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthagimians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giving him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal enery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the denotion of Crithige: better it were that the Citie should bee free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Indges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no leffe impudent, in ful- 20 filling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the countaile of Hanno and his fellowes, were fuch as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too foaring, and careleffe, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in that little courtesse which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begunne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainely given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Etolians had submitted themselves alreadie; and when the Romans defired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and 3@ not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, He might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recoursed in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Masedonian; and therefore per. 40 haps inferted into the couenants, that somewhat might seeme to have been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would seeme to have done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bishynia, the Achaans, Baotians, Thesalians, Acarmanians, and Epirots. On the Roman fide were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Per- 50 gamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedamon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Atolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætoleans, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer flow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much voon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting downe of their name in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busic people; and ministred occasion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better scrue to follow it.

CHAP.3. S.13.

ODENE OT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprifes at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and monieto no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had been etaken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselues Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour

20 had beenethe leffe harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene fuch as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hierotheir friend in Syracule; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicil; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canna, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, vet 30 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereuponto worke For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their seuerall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been throughly prosequited: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should have beene strengthened; what soeuer had become of the rest. But the slen-40 der troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they fent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadic wel-neere bearen downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicil-little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal; then must be patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so 50 much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home. Whatsoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necesfitie; to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Waples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to beereferued for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made vpon Nola; but alwaies with bad fuccesse. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; having the affiftance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman fide, fince the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight loft; which was no great maruaile; his forces being then divided, and imploied in sundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie; and required a yeeres worke to houe taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cume they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They fent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a so- 10 lemne sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but privily fent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Gracehus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consulin so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately flaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they fai- 20 ned so to have done. because this was the first time, that ever two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximusthe late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracehus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentiue to alloccasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had been earmed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, Hee continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe 20 it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base con-

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracehus therefore put himselse into Cuma: whence heiffued at fuch time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cume. There lay Marius Alfus the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with fourteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any dan-40 ger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprise others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came upon the Capuans vnawares: and flew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not aboue an hundred of his ownemen. Their campe hee tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, He escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was enformed how things went at Hama; forthwith he marched 50 thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile, and loading themselues with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cume; which partly for anger, partly for defire of gaining it, & partly at the vigent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal affailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent, about this Towne. They raised a woodden Tower against it: which they brought close vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke or heir Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busie in quenching the fire; the Romans, fallying out of the Towneat two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the flaughter of about fourteene hundred. The Conful wifely founded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their service. Neither would He. in 10 the pride of this good successe, aduenture forth against the Enemie; who presented him battell the day following, necre vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, leeing no likelihood to prevaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the fiege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Conful had taken the field; fome small Townes were recovered by the Romans, and the people seuerely punished for their revolt.

CHAP. 2. S.12.

The Carthaginian Armic was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it felfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of ma-20 king (as formerly he had done) a general inualion vpon the whole Country, to paffe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuoufly wasted by Marcellus, in the the absence of Hannibalias also was Campania, by Fabius the Conful; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in desending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reason, that they should bee protested, by such as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they 30 ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the workethat they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselse Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Comman-40 ders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; served to put the Campans in seare, that Capua it selfe should bee besieged. To preuent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, harkening after newes from Tarentum) and, having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three daies in vaine, hoping to have wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong; and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) affaied Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. 50 Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iournie against Beneuentum:

and T. Gracehus the last yeeres Conful, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanne had with him about seventeene thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part : besides twelve hundred Horse; verie sew of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. Hee held the Roman worke toure houres; cre it could bee perceived, to which fide the victorie would incline. But Gracebiss his fouldiers, which were all(in a manner) the late-armed flaues, had received from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or never, they must purchase their libertie, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the flaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the feruice, by imployment of fo many hands, in a worke fo little concerning the victorie. Gracehus therefore finding his owne errour, wifely corrected it: proclayming a- 10 loud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have libertic immediativ after the battell, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their desperate surie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what hee could, and preffed to hard upon the Roman battell that foure thousand of the flaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracehus had threatned before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength: yet was he glad at length to sauc himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leaving the field, hee 20 was accompanied by no more than two thouland: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promifed: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they ferued in the warres, they should neither cate nor drink otherwise than standing vnleffe fickneffe forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchifed fouldiers were feafted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them having their heads couered (as was the custome of slaves manumised) with Caps, or white wooll. The picture of this Feall (as a thing worthie of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in 30 a Table by Gracehus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthie of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost fince the comming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracehus before at Hama, being things of small im-

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannae. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serve to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to seede their Townes and Armies; without any furplufage, that might be exchanged for other 40 needful commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as living vpon the same Trade, and fubiect to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth sustained and could now doe least for his Countrie, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently confidering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that 50 could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Siciland Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, readic to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Aldrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolued vpon the onely course, without which the Citie could not have sublisted. They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fuluius the Pretor laide 10 open the publique wants; and plainely faid, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers: but that such as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived vpontheir dealing in the common Reuennues, that the charge was vnder-taken by private men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Cenfors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentine to the cor-20 rection of those, that had mis behaued themselues in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cacilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Canna, had held difcourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themfelues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Cenfors: as also were a great many more; euen who foeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes 3º appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to bee) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added therevnto, by this Decree of the Senate following: That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicill, there to serue untill the end of the warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The Office of the Cenfors was; to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of difgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whosevnhonest or vnseemely behauiour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publike Horses of 40 feruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their misbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-fight of mens lines and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and seared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of High-waies, Bridges, and Water-courfes; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encroched vponthe streetes, Highwaies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to 50 make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publike Revenues, to farme: fo that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitic of the Senate: the

the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not have beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never fo many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Whoathough hee hath given vnto Mantheknowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath commonaire being obnoxious puto the Centers, which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impounded by warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philas troubled not themsclues much with pervsing the Temples, or other decaied Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requilite to be done in this kinde: ver forbore they to fet any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generolitie of the Romans. They that had been accultomed, in more happie times, to vindertake fuch peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had beene no such to want: promiting liberally their coft and trauell; without expectation of any paiment, before the end of the warre. In like fort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had beene enfranchifed by Gracehus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citic were in better-case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre foorth as cuery one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quastor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the sustenance of these Widdowes and Orphans: whilest the whole ttocke was vied by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: fo that (the poorer fortexcep- 20 ted) they refuted to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in fogreat want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laied in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if wee consider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names wee have alreadie mentioned. For by this 20 hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and folide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Roote and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Cittle of Athens; when Xernes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from enery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath indiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or flemme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath scene a great example, in the vnited Provinces in the Netherlands; 49 whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilest the Generalitie was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themsclues to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthic, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their feruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at such a rate as wee ought, the patient Resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly fay. That the Cittie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Nei- 50 ther can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, shorld in all renson have been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not

The Romans win some Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The cournie of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans:

S the People of Rome ftrained themselues to the vtmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recouer what had beene lost. The Towne of Casiline Fabius belieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have beene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from

Nola had not come to the affiftance of his Colleague. Neuertheleffe the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it oner: faying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contraricopinion. He faid, That many fuch things, as were not at first to 30 haue been under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prosequuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew scarefull, and craued parlee; offering to give it vp, so as all might have leave to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions: or whilest they were issuing foorth, according to the composition alreadic made; (for it is diuerfly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Consul: who saued them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserued commendations, by hol-40 ding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the reft, or imprisonment atterward of such, as scaped the heat of execution, could bee excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some requiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marfam in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their seuerall guards, vpon hastic desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all saue the Gouernour vnto the sword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Marsam committed two groffe errours; the one, in that hee gaue no or-30 der for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselues in their places; the other, in that bee was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance given and received. Some such ouer-sight, the Gouernour of Casiline seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this Worke was ended, many small Townes of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recoursed: wherein were taken, or flaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrie grieuoully wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ficke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promifed to give vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; having wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintring place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer 10 was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in lone with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil; whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Conful ship, we will speake hereaster.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Conful, and T. Sempronius Gracehus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike feruice, to imploy often-times their best able men; and therefore made 20 it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne : which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: cleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Confull, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feete. The father chearefully did so; saying, It was 30 my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to bee Consul. Castus Altinius a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canna, had holpenthe Carthaginian into that Towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Confull purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a patterne to all Traitors; vling him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their vnfaithful service against the Fatifei, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and faid, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee 40 should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; untill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mansriches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather scuere, than couctous, He sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a 50 flormie and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the fouldiers held the townsmen fulpected;

of the Historie of the World. CHAP.3. S.Id. Inspected; and therefore thought it no wisedome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little relistance, the Arpines gaue over fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had beene betraied by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In processe of this discourse. the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conful: and receiving his faith for fecurity of the Towne, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good relistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offcred to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe; with little other losse, than of him that had betraied it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneiss Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their service; vpon no other condition, than to have their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should bee recoursed by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The 20 Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeelded themselues to Hannibal; returned against o their old allegeance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettie exploits in forraging the country, was llaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it feemed that it would fland him in good flead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his defire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Taventum found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practifing with the Hostages of the Tarentines, & such as had the keeping of them, conveighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or seueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent agains to Hannibal: and ac-49 quainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the Towns on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to have been abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies journie to Tarentum, if hee should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the leffe to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, He caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were so grownecarclesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their bufinesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speede thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way beforehim, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be difcouered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when hee heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet diflodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be fent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrivall; Nice, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in figne that he was readic. Presently Nico beganneto set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him makehafte, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heavie, that scarcet wo men could hand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwithentred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthie the looking on. While the Porter Rood wondring at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had flaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentem at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Ro- 29 mans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bidhim be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskilfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Gouernour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that flood in the mouth of the Hauen, whence hee might earlily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vinderstand, what good affection hee bore them, inueighed bitterly against 30 the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the prefent. This done: and having gotten such spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fallie out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fel out. For when hee beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie fallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him back with great 49 flaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-lland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it vvas joyned by a cawsey. This cawfey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might bee able, without his helpe, to keepe themselues from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went so well forward, without impediment from the belieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Peece it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all forts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was bussed in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapentum: which tooke away all hope of preuailing; and made him returne to his 50 former counsaile. Now for a smuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauen, and could not passe forth. vvhilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilest the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieued; and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience; it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauen; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy, Hannibel told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would been o hard matter to draw the Gallies over Land, and kaugh them into the Sea without. This he undertooke and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and sound Hannibal often-times otherwise busied; than his affaires required. And Har Thus with mutual loffe on both fides, the time puffed and the Roman forces. growing daily fironger, Q. Fulvius Flaceus, with Appens Claudius, lately chosen Confuls, prepared to beliege the great Citic of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hallie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse are the losse and of all necessaries. fill vp thefe Legions, they were faine to take vn yong Boyes, that were vnder feuenteene, yeares of age; and to fend Commissioners aboue liftic miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare feruiceable, & pressing them to the warres; making yet a Law, That their yeares of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning 20 so yong, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neere. the Campans felt great want of victuailes, as if they had alreadic beene belieged. This happened partly by floth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeares made upon their grounds. They fent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they seared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and fent Hanno with an Armieto supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day ; againft which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselues with victuailes, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laied vp in Cities 30 round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packhorses; as if this had beene enough to victuaile Capua. Such was the rechleshesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angrie hereat: and told them they were worfe than very beafts; fince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore hee gaue them a longer day; against which hee made provision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Conful, taking with him fuch Arength as hee thought needfull for the feruice, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behaulour of the Enemie. He lear-40 ned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great Haruest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men preparethemselues, to affaile the Enemies campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, He marched thitherward fo early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, Hee had well-neere forced the campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the leffe defire had Fuluius to loofe more of his men in the attempt; feeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing 30 good. Therefore he faid, that it were better to goe more leifurely and substantially to worke; to fend for his fellow-Conful with the rest of their Armie; and to lie betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the theretrait; hee faw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the fouldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore lome Enligne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture lo desperately; that Fuluius, perceiuing the heat of his men, changed purpose, and encouraged those that were iomewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadie gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were flaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, aboue seuen thousand, besides all the store of victuailes, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Ro- 10 man Confederates. This misaduenture, and the neerer approach of both the Confuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made lhew, to affect it no lesse than carehage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not firong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and fent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Holtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of 20 the Metapentines, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italie, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Hostages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Whereforethe Metapontines, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not bee able to master. Neuerthelesse they helped themselves by cunning inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neere at hand : against whom whilest they proffered their service to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and re- 30 coyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formalitie they vsed in pretending feare, left the Enemieshould breake in together with the Romans; in fauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delinered up the Towne to Hanne and Mage. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Consuls, fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters besell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Semponius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late beene twice Consul, was slaine either by trecherie of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush; or by some starthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should be liege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesse. The Folones, or Slaues lately manumised, for sook their Ensignes, and went enery one whither hee thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuerthagonel acts of hostilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue sisteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, and had the better infomuch that hee caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went seuerall waies: Fuluius toward Cume; Claudius, into Lucaria. Hanmbal followed after Claudius: who having led him a great walke, fetcht a compaffe about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Ceatemus Penula a front man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centunon, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal rested, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trufted with the leading of fine thousand men. The Pathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue 10 of any good Souldier; how meane so euer his condition were. Wherfore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a front Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellowes were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, with eighteene thouland men, was in Apulia, very careleffe, and a man infufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore hafted, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rame, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces 20 acout, under men of small abilitie. Comming upon Fuluius, He found him and his men so sollie, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Falaire, Hee soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aline; leaning all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead be-

These two great blowes, received one presently after the other, much assonished the Romans. Neuerthelesse all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Confuls should goe substantially forwards with the 30 siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That who soeuer would issue forth of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should have his pardon, and bee suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succorsattended from Hannibal. Before the Citie was closed up, they sent Messengers to the Carthagmian; which found him at Brundusum. He had made a long journie, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundusum; vpon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He bade them confider, how a few daies fince he had chased the Confuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would prefently come thither againe and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answere the Meffengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily denoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time: and thereby give him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it 50 selse in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred : and thereby gaue the Consulstime, both to fortifie themselues at Capus, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilest he himselse pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Cludius and Faluius, when their terms of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capus; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsula. The towned men often sallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was casily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troups, that should hold them skirmilh. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velites, having each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick vpon 10 the Enemies horse; whom vanquilling in this kinde of service, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus paffing, and famine daily increasing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnferuiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Bafons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuerthelesse, in pursuing them to their gates. He received a wound, that accompanied him in short space 20 after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthagintan Armie. The Roman campe was even at point to have beene lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vponit, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in fuch fort, that their bodies ferued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some sugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hils, forasmuch as the campe was alreadie lost. But all would not ferue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, having fitten there so long, had at 30 good leisure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to have beene much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vie: on the sudden he entertained an haughtie resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carrie to the walles of that proud Citie, the danger of warrethat threatned Capua. This hee thought would bee a meane, to 40 draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had he his desire: If they divided their forces; then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did hee despaire, that the terror of his comming might so assonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselues to the Enemie. To preuent this danger, He sent letters to Capna by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conveighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journie to Rome, was 50 to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the fuddennesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore hee caused his men, to haue in a readinesseten daies victuailes; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the River of Vulturnu. This could not be done so closely, but

That the Roman Generalls by some fugitives had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therewith affected, accord ding to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsaile to let alone Capua, yea and al places else, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were fo farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should judge himselse strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore floutly faid, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citic, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him to thence; if he were fo vnwife, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fulinius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the ftrength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fifteene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Armie; with which he hasted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reason of his wound,

20 to continue the siege at Capua. Hannibal, having passed ouer Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then he needes must. Yet found he the bridges over Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; fo it made him the more grieuously to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made : his Numidians running before him; driving the Countrie, and killing or taking multitudes of all forts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, 20 one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were peftered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; readie to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middest of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was hasting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Proconful did expire, at his returne home, and entric into the Gates of Rome. Where-40 fore, that Faluius might lose nothing by comming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. Hee and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another:

Fuluius having beene long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrie was able to give. The Confuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he advanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along a great way vnder the wals; viewing 50 the fite thereof, and confidering how he might best approach it. But he cither went, or (as the Roman Storie faith) was driven away; without doing, or receiving any hurt. Many tumults role in this while among the people; but were suprressed by and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both troubleto re, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon forth none other, than the fame of his much during. Wherefore hee brake up his campe and doing what spoile be could in the Roman Eceritorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, He paffed like a Tempett ouer the Countrie; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast; that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, hee gaue it loft: and is likely to have curfed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus difabled him to relieue that faire Citie; fince he had no other way to vent his griefe.

O. Fuluius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who fo would veeld, before a certaine day, might fafely doe it. This, and the very returne of 10 Fullius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to understands that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans confcience of his owne evill deferts, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to convey fuch letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was undertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conucigh themfeluesaway, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the 20 Towne; and the letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus for take the Capuans and them. For (faid they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie bee readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, have wee gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they befought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemics, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promiting, to make a desperate fally, if he would once more aduenture to fet vpon the Roman campe. Such were the hopes of Boltar and his 30 fellow. But Hannibal had alreadic done his best: and now began to faint under the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partifans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Liu.l.30. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besseged in Capua, had beene fent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were fo; justly might they curle their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedilesse necessitie. Howsoever it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconfuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all fuch counterfait fugitiues, as carried fuch messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake 40 the hearts of the Campans: so that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vinto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough wherevnto the matterrended. Wherefore one of them inuited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drink to them fuch an health, as should set them free from that cruel reuenge, which the Enemie sought vpon their bodies. About feuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poylon. All the reft, hoping for more mercie than they had deferued, yeelded fimply to discretion. So one 50 of the Towne-gates was fet open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, difarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthiginian Garrifon; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconfuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe

they were reserved vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Fuluius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversitie.

Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more hastie in taking vengeance: for feare, lest vpon the like respects, the Roman Senare might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common fafetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Thea- 10

nam, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods;

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made al Townes of Italie the leffe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman fide. The Atellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submissio, for very feare, and want of abilitie to relift. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Ful-

Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of revenge, got into

Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherfore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out and the Campans, being detected by a slaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertie promised, was given about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fuluius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme severi-30 tie caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resoluted in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capus (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wines and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to surther deliberation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto seuerall places as best liked the angric Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and com-

only a Roman Prouost was every yeere sent to governe over those that should inhabit it, and to doe inflice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farrespent; and that, which should have reuiued his slame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

modious fite; but no corporation or forme of politic, was allowed to bee therein; 40

uius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. 20

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre against the Romans in those Hands; and were ouer-come.

Chap.3. S.15.

Hilest things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardi-nian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirtie thousand being va in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppresse ic. One

Harlicoras with his sonne Hiostus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promifed the affiftance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed unto the prosecution of that maine businessein Italie; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Har sicoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Q. Mutius the Prætor; who lay sicke 20 in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most gricuous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to have discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Aldrubal, furnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armic; affifted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, & by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitic of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares; so beaten and in such euill 30 plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them. Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and vp-hold in their several Provinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatfoeuer accident required the affistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race afte. 40 him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subjects, if they fel into any fuch disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harsicoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we have spoken before: He landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrie, and sought out the Encmie. Hyostus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Ar-50 mie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their side. This yong Gentleman would needes aduenture to get honor, by giving battaile to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day aboue thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyostus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlins pursued them. Very soone after this descature came Ald ubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindred his voiage, yet soone enough, and strong enough to faue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebells. Manlius hereypon with-drew himselfe back to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (fuch of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his affiltance; their Countrie being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had staied a little longer, A drubal would have fought him out with fome blemish to his reputation. 10 But the fame of Afdrubal and his companie, appeares to haue been greater than was their strength. For after some trial made of them in a few skirmilhes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Foure houres the battaile lasted: and victoricat length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had beene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyostus, and of his father Harsteoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuity of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquilhed Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in short space wanne 20 the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman: who imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best forted with the nature of their seueral offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warrein Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only fauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracufe, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after the battaile of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died: who 20 had continued long a stedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He lest his Kingdometo Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should have beene his heire, being dead before. To this yong King his fuccessor, Hiero appointed fisteene tutors: of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Indronodorus, waxing wearie of so many Coadiutors, beganne to commend the sufficiencie of the yong Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and faid, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of 40 any Protector. Thus by giving ouer his owne charge, hee caused others to doe the like:hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a fortas hee desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gauc himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitic, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his infolent behaviour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, hee would revive the memorie of T yrants dead long fince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, 50 lultful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsailers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsocuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was let on change: but Tiraso, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very carnell to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as vet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his Person, was detected by a groome of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented : 10 thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vndertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end. vnto the extremitic of the torture; he confessed, that he had beene set on by Thrase. whom heappeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrunke for the matter: affuring themselues, that theresolution of Theodorus would yeelde to no extremitie. Thus they all cscaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolued vpon siding 29 with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceffitic, had of late beene fuch, as might have beene termed excessive; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off: regarded only the things present; the weakenesse of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laied out in vaine. to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epicides, 30 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into fuch fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they lifted. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacic, betweene the People of Rome and the King of Syracufe; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needes haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canne; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe: saying, That he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that agreat part of the Island should be annexed to his Domini-40 on; but afterward, that he should raigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered, partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vponthem by neceffitie; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had received such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his journie, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicil, & forbad him to looke big. The money that Hiero had bestowed upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But 50 in stead of returning the monie with thankes, as he had beene directed, and as it had beene noised abroad that hee should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glory, and fend word after him, that he should configne that monie ouer to Marcus beare the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oftentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into such a pittifull tune of thanklgiuing, as must needes have bred forrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of passime and storne; in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innountion in the flate of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than euer, had it beene wifely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, 10 were fent about the Country with two thousand men; to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie offifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betweene him and his guard, frooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word fo joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for seare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their 20 Captaines; which wrought so effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detellation of his bad life, suffered his carkasse to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, posted away; to significall that had passed; to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to prevent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracufians hereupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselues masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island : being yet uncertaine what to doe; betweene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and seare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was 30 the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place . till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But fearc. and better counsaile prevailed so farre; that Andronodorus, having slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had flood in feare, lest they would not have contained themselves within bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their order- 40 ly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, & surrendred up the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had been can cuill Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But fuch was his desire of Soueraignetie: and so vehement were the instigations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had beene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that, being fent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according 50 to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested thereforethat they might be friendly dismissed and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and fet them safe at Locre. This was easily granted: both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well côtended to carne thankes of Hannibal, with such a little curtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good fouldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire ofthese two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the army with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselues, when the Romans & Syracustans were come to agree-10 ment. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of : as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themislius, that had married Harmonia the fifter of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he reucaled the matter to one, that reucaled all to the reft of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themislius, entring into the Senate, were flaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now fince attempted, in seeking to vsurpethe tyrannie themselues. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessarie to this dangerous treason; and that 20 the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recourred those R oyall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die: & executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liucs. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deserued this heavie sentence : but Heracles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the halty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sossppus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptolemie, &c. he durst not returne home; but staied in Egypt as a banished man. This considera-30 tion, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the Southern Companying the Southern ing the flaughter, fo affected the multitude; that (pardoning them felues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incenfed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themissius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present agreat rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of fouldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates; and the leffe that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall 40 crie forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusans and the Romans. But having striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in searc of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and fuffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolue by practice. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison : and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor; attended, by such sugitives, and mercinary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent 50 word vnto the Syracustans, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselse vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracu-sians. For he faid, that since they had all of late served one Master; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Srracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; linee in their fireets the Tvrant was flaine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracule were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the chaine, wher with both the one, and the other were bound : his advice was, that fuch their arrogancie should be checked betimes, creit could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the league. made of lace by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been 10 Subject to HIERO and HIERONY MVS, Sould henceforth be Hall with the fate of Syracufe. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noneltie of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had loft not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crasty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusans. But seeing they had long since yeelded unto Syracuse, and been Subject unto that Citie, by whatforme soener it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable than just. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicides was highly approued in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, 20 to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates & Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri. or whither elfe they lifted, so that they staied not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without wagrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answere was forth-with reported vinto Marcellus by the Syracusians: who offered him their affistance in doing justing upon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition that when the Towns was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction: but forth-with topke the bufineffe in hand; which he dispatched in one 30 day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken : all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicedes fled; and stealing thence away by night, connected themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vsed after victorie; to feeke out the fugitive Roman flaves and renegados, whom hee caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, hee tooke to mercy; for bearing also to strip or spoile them. But the same of his doings was bruted after a contrary fort. It was said, that he had staine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercinaries 40 there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dinomenes two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other Rebells. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrie: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercinaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-fouldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered; and hercupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to bee angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and fet them aworke in some place else : for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their sernice. So toward Herbesus they marched: where lay 50 Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, denising what further harmethey might doe; but now fo weakely accompanied, that they feemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two bretheren were no leffe well aware: and therfore aduentured vpon a remedy little leffe desperate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Oliue branches in their hands, in manner of fuppliants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Greete were in the vantguard ; that had bin well vsed by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare; faving, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vie their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the to matter by seueritie; which would not serue. For when they commanded these two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was fo violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vicertaine what course to take, vito Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thirther when they came, Hippocrates deuised a tricke; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he flood. He caused letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hercof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the fword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him. to make the like dispatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracuse; which were 20 offensiue, all of them in generall, to the libertie of the Citie, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epissle was openly rehearfed the vprore was such. that Sofis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forfake the campe, and flic for their liues. All the Syracustans remaining behinde, had been cut in pecces by the enraged fouldiers, if the two artificers of the fedition had not faued their lines; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischienous knaue that had served among the Leontines, to julitifie the bruit of Marcellus his crueltie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracule, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but fome of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In 30 good time (faid fome) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected who, had they in like fort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might have beenetempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and denising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armic came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnleffe for want of helpe, they would be betraied to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wifest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the fouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Prectors; whom (being forfaken by all men) hee put to the 40 fword, and made flaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of T yrants, gaue liberty to all flaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basfest fort, made himselse and his bother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, here thought it no time for him to fit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadours to Syracuse; that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he necre with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither; not with purpose to doe hurt, but in sauour of the Syracustans, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered. That if their errand had beene to him, he could have told what to fay to them; but fince it was directed vnto others, they should doc well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to beliege Syracule, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee fent them gone; and returned back into the Citic. Immediately beganne the fiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that fo long a circuit of walls, as compassed Syracule, being manned with 10 no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in fome part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrough the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuertheleffe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinfman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could have beene wrought by the Canon, or any in- 20 struments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might fland. For proofe of this bold affertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to convert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To fuch Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injurie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handicrasts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that 30 feemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austeritie, or affected fingularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beenethe vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be under-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit; and things, that every one, could well have performed. Hercof(to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different forts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and afterit) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that lookes vpon our Enless Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke 40 it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the leffe, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be faid of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wife men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by fuch, as could flubber things eafily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would feeme to haue any fecret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a 50 kinde of injustice, that the long trauels of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expense, should be cast away upon men of no worth; or yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And furely, if the paffion of Enuic, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Neuerthelesse, if we have regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection, that every one ought to beare vnto the generalitie of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine wpon the iust and voiust: it will appeare more commendable in wife men, to enlarge themfelues, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lie buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may bee peruerted by cuill men to a 10 mischienous vie. For if the secret of any rare Antidot, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecoverable poyson: better it were, that such a iewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engins, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusans to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vie them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that 20 he had approoued, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitic of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the art of murdering men it was besides his purpose. Marcellus had saufed certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had fundrie deuices; of which any one fort might have repelled the affaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall voly of thot, which 30 they could not endure. Some with an yron graple were taken by the prow and hoifted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by frange engins were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten, that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In like fort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the affault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could earely before day getneere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanck, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which 40 were woond up hard to shoote a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaylants lives. For the shorcame downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great flaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to stay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrific the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to ouercome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had flood vpon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them vnscrto uiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of fight; being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vie them. Wherebehinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vie them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all provision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke.

The

For the enemies having fo goodly an Hauen; the Scain amanner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them : were not likely, so foone to bee consumed with famine, as the beliegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a Citic, having no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable

In the meane while, Himileo, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleete, that had waited long about Sizil, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to dealt with the Senate, that five and twentiethousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, to wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracustans, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to have faued Agrigentum: whither hee came too late; for Himileo had gotten it before. 20 Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as hee could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Humileo; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not missrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, intending to toyne his forces with Himileo. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation heereof helped a little to keepe the Sieilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himileo, iovning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer al the Island at his pleasure, and presented bat- 30 taile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wifely refused it. Bomilear also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himileo, and fafely arrived at Marcellus his campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians, and flue or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to have given over the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentiue to all occalions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to 40 continue the laborious worke of belieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himiles and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to prevaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially heeasfaied to prevaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracufian Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to 50 practife with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the towne would harken to no parice. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse;

CHAP-3. S.15. where he talked in private with some few, as he had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to fend him advertisement of their proceedings; by a fither-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance: all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedamonian, that had beene fent out of the Towne as an Emballador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very delirous to ranfome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it leffe than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcellus: who cauling better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinarie length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therfore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to prenaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to bee held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in for-20 mer times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festivall night, came vnto the walls, which hee tooke by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into foure parts (or five, if Epipola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces. he had the commoditie of a better and fafe lodging, with good fore of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were alreadie in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans 30 had taken and fackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltred under strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives, and Renegados, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could prevaile. Hippocrates and Himileo, were daily expected; and Bomilear was fent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence: It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himileo came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilest Epicides sallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such desence in each part, that the Affailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, 40 they continued to befet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as fireightly befieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed; together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bemilear did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might betaken where he lay, if any great forces were fent thither. This Bomilear wanted no desire to doe his Countrie service : but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staied; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enemie than him: Thisher failed Epicides out of Syracufe: to acquaint him with the necessities of the 50 Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readic for him, he flood off into the deepe; and failed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian Souldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neere as they could fafely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Stracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Hercunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for he had flaied there long enough; and had cause to seare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers, that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their liber- 10 tic and proper lawes, yet suffering the Romans to possesse, whatsoever had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereuponthey, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates even readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiuing their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they prefently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chosen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting only the Fugitiues. The treatie therfore was againe fet on foot, and wan- 20 ted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the fack of Epipola, Trobe, and Neapolis, the parts alreadic taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might viethe libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had beene chosen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercinaries; holding his own particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftic Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadic got- 20 ten all Spaine; and that if ever he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Captaine was eafily wonne, and fent forth his owne brother among the Syracufian Embaffadours to ratifie the conenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene fuch, as descrued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leffe, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercina- 40 ries, should minister vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus, and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately flaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselues had also bin flaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill aduised Personsionned with the fouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they 50 heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine under-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? These things were obiected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracultans with gentle words, and promites of good viage in time to come, than to reflore the bootic, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthie, trong, and many waies important. Neuertheleffe if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefes, whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbors, and by that very forme of politic, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becomming subject vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only affured against all forraine enemies, domestical conspiracies, and fuch Tyrants as of old had raigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of ba-10 nishing, or murdering, the most worthic Citizens; as also from all sactions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the icalousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citie, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victoricit was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make iniustice the more excusable:vnlesse we should approve the answere of that Theele, who being found to have stollen a silver cup from a sicke man, said, He never leaves drinking. By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Sira-

20 cufe: wherin, the booty that it found, was faid to have been no leffe, than could have beene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Stracuse was maruelloufly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; faue only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busic about his Geometrie, indrawing figures, that he harkened not to the noise, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to bee honourably 3º buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an infeription of the proportion betweene them, which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vie, as this may feeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is betweene the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar fort. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had been spent vpon a sonne, whose studies, in the Vniuerlitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded unto the Romans; except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with 40 one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately fent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswassons, Hanne and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselues as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vponthe Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred envie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that having beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritic from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had fent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and 50 to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines, being to step aside vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of sometroubles there among the Namidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracufe, as neede required : which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But what soeuer disproportion was between the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For how soeuer the people of Carthage would gine authoritie by fauour; yet could they not gine worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captaines: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuic of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a fool sh desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they fent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be con- 10 fident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day; but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene milused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their meffage, did so lustily set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands. droue them backe into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himfelfe, and not have hazarded a battell without neede; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soone 20 voon his departure, there landed in the Ilanda supply of eight thousand foote, and three thouland Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, confifting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainously, that no good feruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were fent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have beene, if the Armie lately overthrowne had beene entire. 30 M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacific his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindred the Countrie from revolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Matines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succor of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instru- 40 ction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to fuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honor of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should have been regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Affistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little effeemed, as one out of Office, among his Namidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of what socuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Com- 50 mander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wifest way, to play the best of his owne game, and for sake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Aduersaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening; and to fuffer that harme, in doing whereof hee would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer up Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them utterly out of sicil. The Conful was glad of his friendship: and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines 10 had vnder taken. For hee with his Numidians did forcibly feize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first hee heard the noise, thought it had beene no worse matter, than fome such tumult of the Numidians, as hee had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himfelfe to flight: and fauing himfelfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set faile for Africk; leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

of the Historie of the World.

Lauinus the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice 20 vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee fcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for flaues, and confiscated their goods; fending home to Rome the monie that was raifed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome flood in no leffe necessistie of gold, than of steele: which may have beene the reason, why Laninus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuerthelesse the same of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they fought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yeelded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliucted up by Treason; and fixe onely staied to bee wonne by force. These things done, Leuinus returned home to Rome: carrying 30 with him about fourethousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of outlawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoile of others, in these troublesometimes. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Cirizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall service. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been emploied in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Hand: 49 which they wanted when it beganne.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and HANNIBAL in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

CHAP.3. S.16.

Hortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the leffer Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because hee had not finished the warre, but vvas faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Pro-

uince. Hee staied not long in Rome, before hee was againe chosen Consul together with M. Falerius Lauinus, who succeeded him in the gouernement of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Conful Marcellus, by the Syraculians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Conful, on the other side, reckoned vp the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus 10 each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that hee had taken, nor making the Syracustans free from their subjection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Lauinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellu: which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grienances freely. Afterwards, when his bu- 20 finesse with them was dispatcht, hee gently undertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie; to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Conful, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there have beene alreadie rehearled : but Marcellus was emploied against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with presfing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer fort, that vsed to be emploied in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not line without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who, in this necessitie of the 30 state, were driven to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further confideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of flich extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had alreadie endured so much, as well it could under-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honestie haue been imposed vponit. Neuerthelesse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong flect. Wherefore, somewere of opinion; Thar, since the common Treasure was fo emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectu- 40 all with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that hee had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one salt-seller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods, as also a Ring for himselse, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wise and children, as every one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hashily followed by the Gentlemen of 50 Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuseto doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For fince the publike necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deserued well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: M. reellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Lewings toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon fending the promifed supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the losse of Capua: which gave them cause to looke vnto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little trult to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he 10 well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and therby so diminish his armie, that he should not beeable to keepe the field : or else hee mult leave them to their owne fidelities which now beganne to wauer. At length his jealousie grew so outragious, that he facked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia veelded vnto Marcellus; and betraied vnto him agailant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, 20 then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his defire to effect; without getting the confent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemie. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in private; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was convented, and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meere malies; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This not withstanding, Blassius did not cease to presse his adversaries anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the save who could not be served as the save three thouses of the save the save to the save three thouses of the save the s

Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee flew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laide aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow bufines of farre leffe importance; had now at length refolued, to fend prefently the great supply, that had beene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue beene strucken downe, the next yeere af-40 ter that great blow received at Canne. But since that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty fuccour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Afdrubal should forthwith take his journie into Italie; of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best: the Romans to preuent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, 50 that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay necrevnto Herdonea to get the Towne by pra-Etice. It was not long, fince, neere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluins had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approch. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more hafte than good speede. The Roman Legions made good relistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulury himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common fouldiers that were flaine, the number is vncertaine; fome reporting feuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, because it was at point to have yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did fet on fire: and putting those to death that had practifed with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom hee bestowed among the Thursans and Metapontines. The Conful Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouer-taking him at 10 Numiltro in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darknesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmilhes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and fought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman 20 affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherfore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battaile, but vpon equal termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmilh; as 20 being desirous to keep his Army strong vntill the comming of Asarabal. Yet could he not avoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be luftie and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would never suffer them to bee at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibal had the victorie; tooke fixe Enfignes; and flue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that hee rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stra- 40 tageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, hee did so vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemie, than such displeasure of their Generall; they belought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing thole Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might bee at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemie quiet: and therefore was readie to fight againe; fince all other motives continued the same, and his men had beene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor 50 loft, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselues disappointed of their hope; and the enemie, not withstanding their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie: which hee purchased at so deare a rate; that neither hee, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuerthelesse it sufficed, that Febius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Faluius the other Conful, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Vollgentes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betraied the Garrisons of Hanni-10 bal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing fort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Lauinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on work to besiege Caulonia, a towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ferue to divert Hannibal, from the fuccour of Tarentum. Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Manduria a Towns of the Salentines, sate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carrie it, either by affault or long fiege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Cap-20 taine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof, shee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman fide; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Conful acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, hee might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Mistris, to doe what shee would have him. The Consul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his fouldier to convey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perfwasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the 30 Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolued how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Conful with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make refistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The 49 Tarentines, and Carthaginian foldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obflinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitality that had passed betweene his Father and the Conful. But he was flaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the fword: in fuch fort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This flaughter of the Bratians, was thought to have been emade by appointment of the Conful, to the end that hee might seeme to have wonne the Towne by To force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiofities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of tome Idols, that feemed worthie to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in fuch habit and posture as if they were fighting : he said, Let vs leaue vn-

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vponthole that belieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but hee was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which served to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, hee hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within fine miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was loft. This grieued him: yet hee said no more than this, The Romans have also their HANNIBAL; we have lost 10 Tarentum in such fort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Conful; he incamped a few daies together, so neere as hee was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himfelfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were fent by two yong men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well; that the Consul wrote back by them vnto the Metapontins, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret no- 20 tice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman, the journie to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where; faue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a companie of such lewed fellowes, that it may feeme good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common pouertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refufed to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was confidered; that the Le- 30 gions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of monie: in euery of which yeeres they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemie to bee made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that vvas taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe with- 40 in a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their fathers helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Confuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a 50 better answere, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not ferue: the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but showed themselves willing to vidergoe whatsoever should be layed upon them, without thrinking under the burden. This their offor was so highly pleasing to the Confuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfuil Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good feruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, & thankes accordingly beslowed upon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of 10 those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citic, nor yet to dismisse them nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne consideration of their ill deseruing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuerthelesse, they were faine to open their most privie treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed up to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie.

20 Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not spendall his money; finding such casse successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money fent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could fuffice. Neuertheleffe it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amiffe to note, That fince the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driven to furnish 30 the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left : it must needes bee, that either the bootie taken in new Canthage, was farre leffe then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall. M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluiss. In their yeere it was, that Afarubal tooke his journey out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his prin-40 cipall care to the Easterne parts of Italie, where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if hee had beene readie to come. But fince his hope was vanished, and the long promifed succour of Afdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) readie to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkening to any follicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poucrty of the Roman, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolde many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, 50 totake such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselues, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did fo terrific them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yere following they were

deuiling how to breake out:as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of scucre judgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they vilited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular defire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne : as Fuluius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and . Tarentum, Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all forts of engines; fen- 10 ding for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not flow to relieve the Citie: the fame of whose approch, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warrehad no neede to stand vpon his reputation: which was alreadic so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdome. He entertained the Confuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleafure: but fought to compell the Enemie to battaile, whether he would or no. The 20 Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cineius, was commanded againe to affaile the Towns of Locri; which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the affiliance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost about three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne fines within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the defire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, hee neglected no aduantage. There lay between e him and them an Hillock, ouer-growne 30 with wood that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon fuch, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he fent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground, the Confuls thought it fit to remove their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principal men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gave warning of their approach to his fellowes: who discourred not themselves will they had surrounded the Consuls 40 and their traine. The Confuls, as necessitie compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieued from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake affistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consulls; and did what they could to have brought them fafe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and felldowne dead; then beganne euerie one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consull, had his deaths wound, being ftricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recouered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers; together 50 with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Confuls, were all flaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Confull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the cultome of those times: and bestowing bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the lignet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custodie of Hannibal; who might vieit, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee fent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit vnto any letters therewithall figned. This providence of Crifpinus was not more than requifite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another 10 Meffenger arrived there fent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captine Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needfull. The device was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the revengefull minde; which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemie in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitive; without letting him perceive any figne of diffrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainement of such 20 a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conful was there. The gate was opened, faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must bee, to let them enter. But when fixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themfelues; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an ende with Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard siege.

The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vanteurrors, made the Romans in all consused haste, runne to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the surviving Consuland requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesses whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. Hee did so: and some after died. Then was it thought needfull, that newe Confuls should be chosen out of hand: for almuch as two Roman Armies lay fo neere vnto the Enemie, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were 40 not onely valiant, but well aduised: fince the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by looling himfelfe fo strangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Confulfhip, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endenoured to iovne vnto him in the Consulship M. Linius: one that had borne the same Office. long before. This M. Liuius had been Conful with L. Amylius Paulus, in the yeere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Confulfhip, wherein they did 30 good feruice, they had both of them bin called into judgement by the People: and this Livius codemned; Amylius hardly escaping. Though it hath bin once already noted; yet I cannot forbeare to remember it againe how it pleafed God, to vpbraid the varhankefull Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Canne, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Emilius rather chose to veeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by relisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuiu, he is euen now readic, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a divers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citic, and lived in his Countrie Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitic of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus. being Confuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private in discontented fort as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in ap- 10 parell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard, which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Verielately he was compelled by the Cenfors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where hee vsed to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dillike to what was proposed; either in short formall words, or in passing from fide to fide, when the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some busines weightily concerning one that was his kinfman, he flood vp, and made a fet speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones wereichosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitic of the place: 20 and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect, Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vsed in this dangerous warre. Now feeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lauinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius. and this Marcus Linius. But Livie would not endure to heare of this. He faid it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen 20 Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the People, and repaied good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankefulnesse, to well-deserving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vn- 40 like, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duketo prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, wirhout all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; hee stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly difgraced. Thus is wisdome often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeere to ward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chofen Consuls. As drubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to have the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans viced at this time the fernice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employ- 50 ment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure served in Spaine, two in Sicil and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in seuerall parts of Italie, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Confuls. But the Confuls were men of execution, execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall observance of what the S. nate thought fir. M. Liurus would not firre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Aldrubal; untill he had first obtained, that hee might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other imploiments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yere, among the Stfalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the warre against Aldrubal was alotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neere vnto Tarentu, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Ar-10 mie; that was fent against Hannibal. Neuerthelesse the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Afdrubal was alreadic passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joyne with him; and L. Porcius fent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee fafely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. Amylius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victoric betimes: but ra-

20 ther they stood in seare; lest all diligence, wisdome and valour should proue too little. For fince few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not beenessaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were descated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other : it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour. from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held up her head, cuer fince the battaile of Canna: though it were fo, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilear; and one, that in his present Expe-30 dition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armic: this Afarubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and; gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-bal, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which scare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a penfine traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus & Crispinus, vpon whom in the like fort they had given attendance the last yere; but faw neither of them re-

40 turne aliue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Falius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Liuius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battaile, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victorie; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfic himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asarabal received in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his journie into Italie; such mention hath alreadie been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this

50 place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie except. E. concerning that accident. Adrubal had wreftled with many difficulties in Spaine; Polybbiff. Line by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the citie of Carthage, to ioine with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-pantage of their own fide, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthie sonne of Amilear, and how they hindred his courses undertaken, it cannot bee knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the foightfull dealing of Hannoin Sieil with Offitines, a better man of warre than himfelfe, whom Hannibal had fent into the Iland: we may conceine, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partifans of Hanne, to viethe violent opposition of more carnell malice. Neuertheleffe Afarubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently fuch indignities. as Mulines could not long digest. His iournic into Italie being resoluted vpon; he lay 10 with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of filter; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe. though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could.or would, come to his affiliance. The ouerthrow feemes not to have beene fo great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Afdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, fent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him: but staied behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together and retired in such fort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and 20 fo passed over Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition. he marched away toward the Pyrenees; leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Afdrubal the sonne of Gesco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journie, by fending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether As a rubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effeet) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, fo well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no paffages were defen- 30 ded against him, nor any fort of resistance made, but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to Winter in their Countrie; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journic over the Alpes; were callly won to take part with Asarubal, when he travailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hamibal. were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattaile; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. 40 Therefore understanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre distoyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisabine Gaules. The Liqurians also iouned with Asarbal: and so would the Hetrurians have done; if he had arrived in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie necre, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Afdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee loft a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Confuls leifure to make readie for him; and caufed his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Afdrubal his so timely, and easily paffing the Ales, was about to leave his wintring camps, and go forth to meet with him) to fit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conful, made what speede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from loyning with his brother. He had about fortic thoufand foot, and fine hundred horfe: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannib; was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weake for the journie intended. Afterward comming to Gramentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought unprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there to againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to returne to Melapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie; hee affaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came agains to Venulia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he over the River Austalus to Canusuum, where he sate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canufum: where if he could once againe deale with both the Confuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie, 20 as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out; Rome would have beene vndone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to wish any second victorie, in the naked Champans about Canna; if such an armic, as this which Aldrubal now brings, had come to fecond Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanne was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could have done. Whilest Nerowaited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their fuccour: he was ad-30 uertised of Ashrubal his approch; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by Liuie the Conful. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Afdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that how focuer the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint under the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore hee 40 resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the fuddaine, yet within few yeres, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to flay the progresse of Afdrubal; neither were there any good Legions in a readines, that could doe feruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Herevpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessitic required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet fince the meeting of the two GO Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it feemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would only step asside, to doe fome small piece of service necre at hand; away he posted as fast as hee could, to affitt his fellow Conful. His Messengers ranne before him, to give warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with vi-Etualls, and all other necessaries for his Armic. Linius the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Afdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his journie thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to give notice of his comming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemie, perceiving this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done : and a token given, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; 10 should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was som what increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which received them, should bee enlarged; fince they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counfaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iournic, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and befought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour 20 of the victorie was like to be theirs: for a smuch as the battaile would not have beene undertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls paullion.

As drubal was no leffe willing than the Romans to come to battaile, having long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dreffing, after along iournie. Hercupon he beganne to with draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and 30 gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might she with their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended : but the trumpet, that founded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Livius the Conful, Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon 40 confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, hee changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he distodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the River Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too hea-

uie, and hindred his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his ter came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Conful followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, becable to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, hee bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Wero had the leading of the right wing; Liuius of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of fafetie there was vnto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the beter in conceipt; and opinion; That they were to fight with men delirous to have fled from them. And, according to this prefumption, came Livius the Conful with a proud bravery, 10 to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victorie seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout soldiers; and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midft. Linius therefore, and Porcius, found ftrong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Belides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, were driven to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Astrabal the more consident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and siercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Liuins: which having compassed, he fell vpon Astrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victorie to be manises on the Roman side. For Nero, sinding none to result him in front, ranne all along the depth of Astrubal his battaile: and salling vponthe skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniar's therefore and Astricans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part that brake their first rankes; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes

30 was flaine. The Ligarians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saud themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aline: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, beganne to waxe varuly, and rush backe vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mailet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke between the cares, in the joynt of the necke, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of prenenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to have beene the device of Afdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

40 Great commendations are given to Asdrabal, both by Polybius, and by Liuie.

He is said at all times to have shewed himselfe worthy of Amilear his father, and Hamibal his brother; to have striven with great patience, against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spaine; to have performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and sinally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where sighting brauely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Liuie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Liuie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gave to the Romans at Canna; that sistic fixe thousand of them were slaine, sive thousand & soure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue soure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered, and set as them were flaine, fine thousand & foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captines with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and silver. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

Likely it is to have beene as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Afdrubalcame well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a paralel vnto that of Canne) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian fide, and two thousand of the Roman, to have beene flaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention: but only faith, That some of the Carthagimen Princes were taken aliue; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Barchines: for a smuch as they preferred the honour of themselues, and of their Countrie, aboue their lives.

The joy of this victoric was no leffe in Rome, than had beene the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what fort Nero had left his Armie; the whole 10 Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thirher. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armic that staied behinde, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke: yet referuing their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require every 20 ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters contaying all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their prinate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Afdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them 30 loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afdrubal: especially fince Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had given buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more civill, and leffe prone to the infolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the suddenterrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that 40 which had passed, to make a deepe impression of seare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselse, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselseinto the Countrie of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted mento defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. 50 Wherefore he drew them all into a leffer compaffe in the vtmoft corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly devoted to his feruice. In this businesse Mero gave him no memorable impediment : either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces vnited ; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Linius the other Conful tarried among the Cifalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to fet things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee desired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph, as he well de-10 ferued. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late vi-Storie: order was giuen, that not only Liuie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero; though leaving his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Line made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armicalfo being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cacilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, 20 the due acknowledgement of their good service. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to bee chosen Consuls : and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeede from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; faue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold him-30 selfevpright. And furely very notable are the commendations given vnto him by Polybius; whom Liuie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armic, compounded of fo many fundry Nations, Africans, Spamiards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, orany other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in

That he sustained his Armic, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in 40 time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuation vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leave him, vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio, whose doings will benceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

How P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

AGO, & ASDR VBAL the sonne of Gesco, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear departed thence into of Spaine, when Afdrubal the sonne of Amilear departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuic a supply of men and Afdrubal with draw himfelfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the fame perhaps that had lately beene emploied in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeede in place of Adrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely 20 that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilear, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did profeer much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon defire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home or whether your confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanne tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoling afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other perswasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentive, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrabal the sonne of Amiliar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italie, to the affiftance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Confuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he fent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and fine hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celtiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouer- 40 throw, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartning & reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago faued himselfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand; and in ten daies journey brought them safe to Afdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either flaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntil all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; & saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie flood, by the comming thither of Afarubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteene hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by 50 fome Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to fend them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessitie & fuccesse of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well ad-

uenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued under Hannibal, and those that had beene sent ouer into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed As drubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was closed up in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such considence vn-10 to Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Afdrubal therefore yied the benefit of the scason; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the Enemie, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe : without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by affault the Towne of Oringis. Against the next yeeres danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared not coft, nor trauaile, in strengthning himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seventie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie 20 Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raifed, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee judged it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliares; made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Colchas, that was Lord of eight & twentie Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and fine hundred horse for his seruice: hee resolued to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee 30 able to docgreat harme, if they would renolt. So with fine and fortie thousand foot, and three thou fand hor fe, he fought out the Enemie; necre to whom hee incamped. At his first comming, Mago and Masanissa fell vpon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whileft hee was making his lodgings. But hee layed certaine troups of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retrait: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betooke themselues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added fome courage to the Romans, and abated the prefumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmilhes betweene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. As drubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged 40 it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Afdrubal being ftill the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himselse into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both fides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to the son the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before deligned. But Scipio, when hee purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and 30 withall, came forth earlier then he had been wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then fent forth his horse and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vling herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Aldrubal fent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans s whilest he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which he encamped. In the skirmilhes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better : fince being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retrait vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselues, were like to hold out better then the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards farre behinde them, that came on leifurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercinaries that stood in Asarabal his wings, were no way comparable, saue only in num- 10 ber to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose: they were forely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine have succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battaile which wascoming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Afdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must have cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Ro- 20 man wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived he should have found himfelfe inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Canna. Wherefore he did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts 3 or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In processe of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured luftie; when the others beganne to faint with travelland heate of the day. Wherefore perceining their advantage, they followed it the more horly: and gave not over, till they had forft the enemie to change his 30 pace and runne from him. Afdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it calle to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Astrubathad that day beene taken; if a ftorme of raine, which fell violently on the fuddaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to give

The same night, Asarubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and overlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein 40 hee feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his fubiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Afarnbal had fet his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Afarabal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sca. Scipio followed the next morning: & ouertaking the Cartha- 50 ginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seven thousand, that with Astrobal himselfe recouered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This place he made shift awhile to defend but wanting there necessaries to sustaine himselfe long, he was for laken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherfore he refolued to make shift for one and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-fide, that was not farre thence; he tooke shipping, and set faile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Astrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanisa staied in it) whilest he with the rest of the Armie did what was needful in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanista followed Asarabal to Gades: and their Armie dispersed 10 it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Illeturgi, Caffulo, and Affapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans: of which only: Car fulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who faid, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes beene inclinable to the Romans; if not aitogether at their denotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but 20 with great crueltie betraied, and flue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrowes. Astapa was a Towne, that had still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himsefe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by affault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubelius. Astapa was taken by Lucius Mareius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and filuer, with what soener else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard; that should kil and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouison being 30 made: all the Inhabitants that could be are armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe; where striuing beyond their power, they were every one flaine. Then was the Towne forth with fet on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : and many of the Romans confumed with the flame; whileft they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and silver, which they saw lying on the pile readie

to melt.

As lrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leaving Asgo behinde him, to but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leaving Asgo behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Sypham Kingof the Missilia, apeople of the Numidians; hoping to winne him to the friend-to ship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, having driven the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did foorth-with bethinke him selfe howers simils the water; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke.

For Scipio, nating unter the Carina Management of the like diffress in Africke. himselfe, how to finish the water; by putting them to the like distress king that Hereunto it seemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much available: a king that had many times sallen out with the Carthaginiams, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seeke revenge. He had also beene beholding to P. and Cm. Scipio, that fenr him over a Captaine into Africke; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as hereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Some, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Szipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lalius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine; casily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better. and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee Was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre diffant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea : and arrived in the Kings Port, at the fame time, with Afarubal. This would have beene very dangerous to him, had he beene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen, they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; feeing at 10 one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselse, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into conenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

. Funerall games held by SCIPIO. A Duell between two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

CLIP I o returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next Dycere, vpon thole of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great folemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their liues as was vied in the Citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offe- 30 red themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to give proofe in fingle combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orsua, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherfore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the Principality: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brothers yet this his fonne would not let it goeback; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his 40 father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadic laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betweene them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, eafily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats have beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betweene Hector and Miax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene Dauid and Goliah; and others performed by some of Davids Worthics, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweenetwelue of the Tribe of Inda, and as many of the Bensamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curiaty that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corninus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leffe importance, as having onely reference to braueric. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironfide and Canutus the Dane, for no leffe than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon enery occasion, great or small. In the raigne of Edward the third, who fultained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie

10 of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of brauerie, and of gayete de cure, as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or what soeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselues. But befides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in writ of right.

20 And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake even now, betweene Corbis and Orlug. Vnto these (me thinkes) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene David and Goliah; or that betweene the Horaty and Curiaty: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Hen- Ao. 21. Ric. 2di. rie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Ansley and one Cattrington: whom Ansley charged Ao.3. Ric. adi. with treason; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Effex. The like also, betweene a Nauar- Ao.9. Henr. 2dis 30 rois, and one Welch of Grimsby, who the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the acculation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But we enery where find, That, if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee ouer-come, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for trial of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the 40 raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, looseth only his cause, not his lfe. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as every Lord of Fce, Ecclefiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Me- * Si hamines de morialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat Loraice Vadia were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the par - Duelli temere ties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the 50 partie vanquished for seit an hundred and twelve shillings. And vponthis custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vie when any man hath had an hard or vniust iudgement; saying, That bee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; on le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Tuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and ZZZZZ 3 specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop "uper ad nosr .- of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to oreritatis, quit thers, wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such Theobaldi Au- challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retrencht by Saint Lewes, and Philip the (aire; fo that no man should decree, or grantit, saue the King rant nobig guest himselfe. It hath since beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; quidim miles Domini RodulDomini Rodulphi quendam gainst Moro, his Countriman: wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet militiem comitis now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and lastly to the Lord of ad Monomachia Chast. Now in those Challenges, vponaccusation of Treason, Murder, or other of- 10 bare proposation fence descriping death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces dessenses per une dementir; The Desendant was bound to pleade not guiltie, by giving the accuser the Lie; otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime ; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combatieuery pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giuing of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had paciently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obication and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe fo many Duells, as are founded vpon meere private Anger, yea or vpon matter feeming worthie of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint perfonall combats; the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accufations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word to terrible, and a wrong to vnpardonable, as will admit no other recopence, 30 than the bloud of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the FrenchGentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we have derived a kinde of Arte and Philosophie of quarrel; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yeathere are (among many other no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiolitiesherein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a flight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword: the one having relation to a slaue; the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for my owne part, if I had had any fuch Italionated enemie in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the 40 point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I fay, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; vie nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speake and sweare fallly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World. and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed & sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being sucd in some Court or other of Instice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make nowa-daies? What is the vowing of their feruice, and of all they have, yied in their or-

CHAP.3.S.17.1.2. of the Historie of the World. dinarie complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good-morrow, or falute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (faith a wise French-men, deriding therein the Apilli custome of his Countrie) une marche er complot fait ensemble the le mocquer, mentir, or piper les uns les autres : A kinde of merchandize, and complet made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other : and to farre now-a daies in fashion, and in vie; as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is not withstanding (omitting the old distinctions) that there is great difference betweene these mannerly & complementall lies, with those which are somrime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise, and those which men to vse out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villainous. But now for the Lie it felfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That who o gives another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other lide, He that giues any man the Lie, when himselfe knowes that he, to whom it is giuen, bath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause have I, if I 20 fay that the Sunne lhines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's mid-night; to profecute such an one to death; for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffianlike. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with anyntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vetered) but all that is rude, ought not to bee civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, That these discourses sauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell: whereas he that 30 is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be scared. For against an Enemics sword wee shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the World. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preserver of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritic between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pana: sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr : fo it is not fighting that declares avaliant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which whosoeuer shall resolutedly end his life, resolutedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie : as hee may justly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious 40 hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devill. Neither doe we in-deede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would bee

reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; Animafg, in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I fay that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe

fauour him that is affailed, in the flaughter of the Affailant, You will secondly aske like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to fatisfic the challenger in private combat? I answere that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion oner it, which can

50 me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cartel by one of

judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Actes honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Denill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel lo accompanied. To this perchance it will bee anfwered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have seldome taken any such advantage over men of qualitie; who vpon even termes have slaine their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it : so did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publique 10 combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law: fo did they diffaine to submit themselves to the shamefull revenge therof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-pursse or other Theeucs. Nav let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manflaier freed by his pardon. For the fetwo remedies hath the partie grieved not withstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (faith St. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further faith (for I vie his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man slaier) be convinced either by Great Affize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-flaier shall die notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (faith the samelearned Gentleman) 20 are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemie, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnsufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will cafily give satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our felues for the recouerie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things elfe, by which the lives of our felues, our wives, and children, are fusiained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may bee fellonie, to take by violence even that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet 30 againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the loffe of our goods, of our lands, or of our lines; and I fay fo too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee fo deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historic, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looseth his honor. But the acting of a private combate, for a private respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because even and equal in persons and 40 armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England bath power to sauce every mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill words that we have given, and to confesse that we have done him wrong to whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that gives ill words in choller, and fuddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them upon adulement; bath the disaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made 50 for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Mounfieur de Plesis, that was firicken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue judge-

CHAP.3.S.17.1.2. ment, M.de Plesis was fet in a chaire under the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls fate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a fword with the point towards him selfe; and in his left hand the like cudgell or ballinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Pless; both which weapons he delivered into Pless hands, submitting himselfe to fuch reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons, the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Pless, to vie his ownedifcretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselse, as one beforehand in point of honour, who strucke M. de Plesis, like to a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (hauing advantage of companie, and his horses ready) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himselse in this shamefull manner; Or whether Monsseur de Plesis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgaue him aler any wise maniudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no diffrace vnto him: I answere, that one may say as well, that it is no diffrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies bv him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that en-20 forced repentance is no difgrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact : which (but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance it selse, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainely, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie iniuries or suddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, then reuenge them: fo men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselues. For he that knowes himselse

20 indeede to be a valiant man, scornes to hunt after the opinion. Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France have , bath alfoa Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose indgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preserved; wee may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submitour selues in all controuersies of livelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere, was no lesse charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face : but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Reuenge, which hath stung 40 to death, and caten vp of seucrail Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeuoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer-more. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no leffe happy in preuenting the like mischiese, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious va-

Vnto this that I have spoken oflying, and ofman-slaughter, it must be added. That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or leffe, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and fuch fuch pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vettered by false witnesses: the former fort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; thoughour Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priviledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptuensly upon a to man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wast for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the sirfs, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now raigning, have given notable testimonic of their justice, upon three Noble men, who ning, have given notable testimonic of their justice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de baute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinallot Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no very deare vnto her. His Maieltie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no less ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans; euery Agehath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Authour of the French Recherches gives vs two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquire) fit

The other was of the Great France, the sirst, you his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Ad-

mirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good service which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the desence of Mar seilles against the Emperour; gave the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King sit being easie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, and 40

other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Advocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got

The last Alts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Conful.

"He last busines that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangeroufly ficke, in fuch fort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettic Kings, that had for faken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainely perswaded. that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and 20 hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suessetani and Sedetani. Confederates of the Romans, and wasted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebells, grew to be affected with the like diftemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might fatisfie their defires; or as they thought eafle to bee gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time ferued very well, to enrich themselves with spoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonells, that should have bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius V mber, to be their Com-30 manders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were denising, what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such com-

the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whileft they were deuiling, what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion; as was expected; there arrived more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonells, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to bee glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie justice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them to feare, of what they had descrued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make readic the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition

the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition againe Mandonius, and Indibits; He caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to assembly; and hauing them what med as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inneighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Reman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight rhousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received e-sourcey man his pay when he was sworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have beene contented to be quiet; but by the seueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in searc, as

Scipio obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of MA-SANISSA who toyned with Scipio. The victories against ASDRVBAL and SYPHAX.

VB. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, entring into their Confulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasurie; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reviue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to give hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embaffages availe much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and descruedly; saying, That they were the most happie of all their Countrimen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Couful, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadours were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romanes, had well deserued. Neuerthelesse, when Sei-20 pie proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Province: there wanted not many, cuen of the principall men, that vehemently gainefaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus, the chiefe: who seemes to have been troubled with that discase; which too often causeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleaged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasuric was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was exa tremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure bee recalled vnto the desence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italie flood, not only of Hannibal, but of Ma-30 gohis brother, that was arming the Ligarians: as also concerning the honour of the Conful; which would (he faid) be greater in setting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of leffe moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for having suffered Afdrubal to passe into Italie: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and good) might be fent from Carthige, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whill the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere 49 a Prouince: which the Consul neuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as is it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insified vpon this one point, That it was better to make an offensiue, than a defensiue warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Lieinius his Colleague would bee as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiling to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the 30 manner of his proceeding: for a fmuch as it was noy fed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who resented in this honourable manalittle spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had comman-that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to bee

ded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio teferred himselse wholly vntothe Senates being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them: and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them : and fending Lelius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the Hills, and charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to preserve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio : and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilio, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, then they formerly had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanilla: 10 who fecretly promifed to doe him all feruice, if the People of Rome would fend him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasurie, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, hee landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But hee failed in the attempt: and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his ta- 20 king leaue of them, would not suffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mage. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made fuite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied 30 him: for that it had as yet beene granted vnto no Proconful; excepting to fuch, as received that dignitie after a Confulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cafar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were staied by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to have the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loofe that honourable charge, by any 40 mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of emploiment so farre off.

good will and pleasure; whereby hecobtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicil might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passeouer into Africk,

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipto to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fellout, that Migo, comming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italie, than that which Addrabal had lately made. He could not indeed raife any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them diffracted with civill warres. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fit- 10 test for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnsteadie Gaules readie to enter into his pay. Hercupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liquia, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him fent thither (the report is vocertaine) loaden with the bootie that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much difable him : and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with 20 store of money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be re-

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Raman Hiltorians have beene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where heer assessed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelessed; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they sinde a notable change. A great pestilence, insessing both the Carthaginian and the Raman Campe; is said to have beene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which sell not out much amisse for the Citie of Rama, that was marual-lously empowerished by this warre; and had alreadie tryed the vtmost way to destray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since conficated) should bee sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losse, the tenth part of the sine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to 40 make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did hee over-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wifer than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councells of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carricall the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne judgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giving happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being, wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-fivay the reft. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature forted well with the businesse, 50 that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduife, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such fort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italie about seven thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes: every place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could affoord. Vnto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of fine and fortie daics, hee had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into 10 Sieil. In Sieil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canne: which were olde Souldiers, and (as hee him felfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heavie censure. They had served under Marcellus and Lauinus, at the taking of many Cities, and ftrong peeces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vie to him in Africk, where would bee flore of fuch emploiment. For increasing the number of his horse, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and such as loued well their case. These he afterwards discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment : but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whileft hee 20 was providing, to have things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman fide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promifed to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprised. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which fent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like fort, fearing left their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The 30 Townsfmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodic of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Lacrians unto the Roman Senace; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proferpina, that had a great fame of fancitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Theeues. The Lograns therefore adulled the Senate to make present a-40 mends to the Goddeffe for this facriledge: faying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreffed the injuries done vnto them, fent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they cast into prison, & vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proferpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabins was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a manin Locri; and had not carefully harkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp inuective that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against to the diffolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any service toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that ten Legates were fent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journie, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had alreadic emploied Latius in Africk; rather to make discoucrie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and struck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journie was, That speaking with Masanissa, he will informed himselfe of the state of Affrick; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made 10

vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuie doth protesse, That there was no such euident cause thereofat the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inseriour to Liuie, both in Worth and Time) gives one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary tructh. Only the doubt is, Howit could any way come to paffe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Line, if it had beene true : vnlesse we should beleeue, that he wifully forbare to rehearfea Tragedie; the forrow whereof would cause Appian. Alex- men to thinke amiffe of Scipie. How focuer it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many 20 circumsances of things done confirme it. Afdrubal, the sonne of Gifco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Mafanifi loued. Mafanifa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Afdrubal to be his sonne-in-law When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the mariage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanifa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemie. Hereof Masaniffa was advertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he 30 thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circum pection conucighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that how soeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Afdrubal, was promifed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax:

yet fince this their courtesse proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill A s DRVBAL had fent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was confummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybins, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his works 40 remaining) Linie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports. Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended by order of the Country, vnto Defalces the brother, not vnto Ma-Sanifathe sonne. But this Vncle of Mafanifa shortly died : and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselse Protector ouer the yonger which was a child. The Traitor sortified himselfe against Mafanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Sypbax. But all would not serue: He, and his Pupill, were disposseffed of their Estates by Masaniffa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should have beene 50 glad, that Masanisa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not beene guiltie of the injurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Coulin raigned, and hee seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuerthelesse Majanissa still retayned the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the leffer Syrtis, betweene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: vet fo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrie, euen as farre as to Hopo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haften on Scipio to the inualion of Africk. But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good succeffe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Majanifa; fent an Embaffage into Sicil about the fame time, which was little pleafing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made; and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not choose but fight for the defence of Africke, wherein he was borne and raigned; and for defence of his beloued wives Countrie. ifit were inuaded. Neuerthelesse hee promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a 20 little advanced his enterprife; in procuring both the affent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Lest therefore the fayling of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way to preuent all discourse, and set the warre undertaken immediatly on foot. The Embassadours he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what hee had promised hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having fent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make ready for the voyage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masaniffa hath beene with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondring voon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will 30 prouide for themselues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented an further inquisition, that might else haue beene made concerning themessage of these Embassadours; whose followers had beene scene walking vp and downe S, racuse. And ich any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the bulinesse, Scipio immediatly sent about his fleet vnto Lilybeum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicil, to meete him there; hasted thither with his Armie. At Lelybeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the division of the Legions between them; which to leave behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africk. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twentie

49 hundred horse; others increasing them to fine and thirtiethousand, horse and soot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I holdeit needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Linie, and fitted them to a Prince of

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neare unto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is uncertaine, whether it were that 50 Cape or Head-land which borethe name of Mercurie, and lay to the Noth-cast of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arrivall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promoniorie to have beene the fame, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the leffer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But for asmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arrivall, Scipio encamped before Vica, that flood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seems, that hee landed within the Promontoric of Apollo; whence the way to Vica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were fent, the next day, fine hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that round about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vfuelly reforted, like as before he had met with Lalius at Hippo that was farther off: as it would have beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the to trouble of a long journie, and fetch a great compasse to Vices, by Land; when he might have difembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the leffer Syrtis; fince he gaue charge to the Matters of his thips, at the fetting forth from Lilybaum. to shape their course for that coast. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make relitance. Thus much perhaps Mafaniffa had fignified vnto Lalius, when he foake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, how socuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to be such, as not only served to invade the Lands of Carthage, but 20 threatned a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better adule

The Cirthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in hafte. Aferabal the fonne of Gifco, the same that had lately beene chased out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hinne and his fellowes, of whose faction he was : or it ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in law, working him (no phix and to him, informing them of the Inualion: entreating the one of them to give affiliance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citic, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be readic, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and flaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveighed abourd his Hulks or ships of burden, and sent them backe loaden into Sicil. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Saleralay another Hanno, with foure thousand Nuces; made Scipio to perceive the viskilfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he fent Malanissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a Brauado, trained out the improvident Hanno fo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victoric was eafily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or flaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citic of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie dayes hee spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and vling all his engines of batterie whereof he had plentic; yet was in no for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must bee well stored against the yeare following. Whilest thus necessitic viged him to leave Viice: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: As and Syphax gaue him the honour them to fet faile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores. doubt ) against the Romans : when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Sy- 30 mi iau horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled pla- 40 likelihood of preuailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time 50

of a faire pretence to leave the fiege. A/drubal had made a Levie of thirtie thoufand toot, and three thou fand horse; yet adventured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the comming of Sypham. Sypham brought with him vnto Carthige fittle thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Afdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the bankes of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horfe-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his ships; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vinto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Or cattaile and other bootie Masaniss had brought in great flore; by driving the Countrie, before the comming of Afdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some: and great store was fent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turne; for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as hee could belt spare; especially with Captines to be sold for slaves. A/drubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio: not fo itrongly fortifying themselves, 20 as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the seuere institution, which the Romans vied in discipline of Warre; or for that they prefumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue foorth of his strength, and fight So the Winter pailed without action. When Spring drew neere; Scipio thought it good to affay his old friend the Namidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was confidered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconflaint; and particularly, that Syphan had given proofe of before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse wearie with satietie of his wife, who 30 had caused him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee mooned with a little entreatieto with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that (uch a triend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was necre at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had beene innited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while; his wife Queene Sophonisha lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. How soeuer it were, S: phix did only make an outrture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should bee recalled out of Italie by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like fort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe 40 were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipioat the first give care: yet being pressed earnessly by many messages from Syphan, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadours: He beganne to make thew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, and covered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaves: vnder which they lay carelefly without their Trenches. Vpon this advertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their camps on fire; and thereby give them so a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of fome such stratageme, Hee forefaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serve. It was a plaine open Countrie wherein hee lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be refifted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt voon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadous he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like states, that wandring (as it were) idlely vp and downe the Campe, might observe the waies and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee defired; vpon the fudden hee fent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, for a much as he could not get the content of his Councell of warre; without whole approbation, all that himselse could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the 10 end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his defigne in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Afdrubal and Syphax were very penfine; as having lately perswaded themselues, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refufall of peace, as did M. Atilius after the like prefumption. But if he should refuse to come foorth of his Trenches: what elfe remained than to beliege him? which they themselues were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was miking readie for the purpole. By fuch discourses these two comforted themselues: 20 recompencing in conceipt the loffe of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the future, they prouided not against present danger; but continued in the fame negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipia, Hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand, asit were to doe Iomewhat against Viica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Vitea before. This he did, partly to keepe secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemie might happen to have notice of it spartly to hinder those of Vica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leave behinde him in 20 his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the journie. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the desence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake hunselse with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lalius and Masanisia, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to have taken hold by casualtievpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the Campe of Afdrubal, it would bee suspe- 40 Red as the doing of enemies; and give Syphax warning to looke vito himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and foftly; that Lelius and Masanissa, who had a longer journie, and were to fetch a compasse about for searc of being discoucred, might have time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of syphan beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himfelfe, imputed vnto casualtie; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, fome, starting halfe assecpe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But fuch was the tumult, that they neither could so rightly understand in what case they were; nor give remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the slame, which grew greater and greater many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, tell vpon the Enemies sword, which was readie to receive them. Especially Mafaniffa, that be it knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them; having laid all the waves, by which he foresaw that they would seeke to cleape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: fo that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would ferue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart : where, teareleffe of any danger towards themselues, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. Hee therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, 10 he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aldrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not Hand to make relistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in such a manner : it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been said, that with leffe than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue given some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to faue his owne fearefull head. Neuerthelesse Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have beene true, That if Afdrubal, Excerpt. Pol. 20 or any of those about him, would have firmen to shew valour, when the campe was 116.14. once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a searcfull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that confumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that bath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few themselves in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes have beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made 30 away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Linie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius; may seeme to haue followed some lesse wor by Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in cafling vothe summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and fine hundred horse, to have escaped; fortie thousand to have perished by sword or fire; and aboue fixe thou fand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of four escore and thirteene thousand, which were in these did escape; which accompanied Astarubal and Syphax in their severall waies of flight.

Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued

Aldrubal, putting himselse into the next Towns that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, untill the Carthaginians at good lei-49 fure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and fine hundred horse : which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne ; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give anend. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; Heshrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthaze. As for the Towne, which hee left, it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoyning would needes bee valiant, and make countenance of warre: but 50 their ftrength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege

The Carthaginians were fore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable ouerthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastic provision for the future: but how to docit, few of them faw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithit anding the loffe of this Armic, the wmight well defend themselves against the Romans, by raysing new forces: especially, if Syphex would not leave them. It was therefore concluded. That they (hould bend all their care this way, leaving in all hafte another Armie; and fending Embaffadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, As drubat the sonne of Gisco, was imployed to make new leuies of men: 10 and Oucene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphan; who having gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late flaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisbalaboured so with her husband, that at length she wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports : as if their courage, and the armes which they vied, were not to be relifted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeved these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Countrie of Spaine had beene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the 20 Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaffidours helped with a lie; faying, that there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirtie daies they made up an Armie, consisting wellneare of thirtie thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fiue daies journie from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with fome part of his Armie; to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now beene 3º time for Aldrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to wearie out the Enemie by delaies. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worfe Commander, or else it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himselfc. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrarie side, as drubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniar ds, the Battaile. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Aldrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Mafanissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, even till they were all in a manner 40 flaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercie, since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall vnto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Aldrubal, and Syphan elcaped: Aldrubal, to Carthage; and Syphan home, to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediatly fol-

Scipio, having thus gotten the masterie of the field, tooke counsaile about the profecution of the Warre. It was resoluted vpon as the best course, That hee himselfe, with part of the Armie, should attempt the Cities round about him : and that Ma- 50 fanissa, with his Numidians, and Lelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else hee might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice it feemes that Mafanissa gave: who knew best the qualitie of the Numidians; of the Historie of the World. and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victoric. The least that could be expected, was his relititution into his owne Kingdom, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no leffe concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Leius was sent away with Mafanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yeelded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid voon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italie. What to doe in this case the 10 Carthaginians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemie: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durft they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neverthelesse of their owne free will were likely to give little helpe. Very much it grieued them, to fend for Hannibal out of Italie: yet lince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embassadours should bee forthwith fent to call him home. Some there were that gaue advice, to fet out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakely manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, Thatie thould be their principall care, to fortific by all meanes the Citie of Carthage: vpon 20 the fafetie whereof they faid that all depended; adding, that whilest they were true, and at vnitie among themselves, they might well enough sublist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheleffe it was confidered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre: without any way advancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no. though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might bee taken or destroyed. Wherfore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no soo-30 ner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: fome, to fortification of the Towne: fome, to make readie the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselues for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those daies very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defencible piece adjoyning, he easily tooke; the Garrison forsaking it, and running away as foone as he drew neere. But whilest hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie, He might perceive the Carthaginian fleet setting forth, and making towards Vica: What this meant, he readily conceived: and flood in great feare, left his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being 40 heavily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for affaulting the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vica, to affift with his presence in this needfull case. It fellout well, that hee had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could be indeede have beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their comming to Viice, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battaile, as if the Romans would have put 50 forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would bee sufficient, if hee could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea: it should little availe the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Effate by Land. Wherfore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with flore of Darts and other cafting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any advantage or neede: but these he couered with plancks; vsing the masts and vards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the affaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood voon the bridge, had fure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole 10 strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteadie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, adventuring foorth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood voon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely beflow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting thefe their friends. that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which served as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all afunder; in such fort that one ship followed another, and 20 all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to faue themselues as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater then their victorie: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage; Lalius and Masanissa, in their journie against Syphax, found as good successe as could be defired. The fame of the victories alreadie gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: 30 the Mafefili, his subjects, joyfully receiving him; and for saking the Vsurper. But here they flayed not: neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and, therefore being follicited by Afdrubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But besidethe instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masafili would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leffe vnwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; be the title vnto some part neuer so vnjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite; which 40 thought that shee had vomited up her owneguts, when it was onely the garbage of fome other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeued the Kingdome of the Masasyli to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Malaniffa will shortly give him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene converted into strong enmitie; as also to fet in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Caribaginians. How casily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this 50 day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they mer with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion.

Centurion, long agoe fent vnto him out of Spaine fron Cn. Scipio. But though hec could teach his men how to march in order; yet could hee not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all forts, gathered up in haste; and few of them had seene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: fo that at length Syphan, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith overcharged Masanilla, whose numbers were farrelesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victorie : some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine to make them give ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this affistance: and charging afresh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, caused him to give backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person 20 against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out wnhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It fufficed, that they for fooke the place, and fled and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanista told Lelius, That this victoric should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe Citic of the Kingdome; whither hee himselfe desired to bee sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lalius agreed. Masanista comming to cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee: wherein by many faire promifes and threats, but ed 30 specially by shewing vnto them Syphan bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and every one strong to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophonisba yeelded her selfe into his hands : and vehemently befought him, that flee might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautic, so commended her suit, that Masamills forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, fince the was his wife. But Lalins, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainoufly; fothat at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-entreated by Masanissa, he 40 suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipto's discretion: to whom hee fent away Syphax and other Captiues immediatly; following shortly after himselfe with Malanissa, when they had done what was needefull in the

At the comming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Astrabal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune; ministring to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipto demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to for fake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon 50 them, vnprouoked. He briefely answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Furie, and a pestilent creature : and saying, That Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe; since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and flood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Masanilla, as thee had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Misanissa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together hee louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head; and that the was a mischieuous enemie of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections; and not to deface the memorie of his great services alreadiedone; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Malanisa blushe. and wept: and finally promifed to be gouerned by Scipio; whom hee nevertheleffe 10 entreated, to thinke vpon his faith given to Sophonisba, that the should not be delinered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time fpent in agonie, he called vnto him a feruant of his that had the cultodie of his poyfon (which Princes then yied to have in readines, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, (ent it vnto her with this meffage. That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but fince they who had power to hinder him of his defire, would not yeeld thereto. he fent her a cup, that fliould preferue her from falling alive into the handes of the Romans; willingher to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to fend vnto his new wife, the must accept of this; adding. That theemight have died more honourably, if thee had not wedded to lately before her Funerall. And herewithall shee boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Limit reports. But Appear varies from this; and fets it downe'agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the pracontract betweene Masanssa and sophonisha. Hee faith, That after the taking of Syphan, Embaffadors from Circa met with Lalius and Masanissa vpontheir way thither, yeelding vp their Citic, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne private, fent meffengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in 30 whose power the was. Majaniffa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphan, how cunning in perfwalion Sophonisha was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Mafanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Mafaniffa faid, the was his owne wife. and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he faid it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall hee sent to fetch her away: 40 and Misanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her; but making her acquainted with the necessitie, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans her dead bodie; which he royally enterred. The fudden violence of Majaniffa his love, and the readic confent of Sophonisha to marrie with him: adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appear, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which a Livie notes) of the sudden falling out betweene him and the Carthaginians; vnder whom he had bin trained vp, & done them great service. Howfocuer it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, fent for Majaniffa, and comforted him as well as he could; left his melancholic should lead him to some incon- 50 uenience. Hauing thereforegently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him foorth in presence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deferued of the Citic of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gave vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way to dinert his thoughts from the fadde remembrance of that which was past. vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to smile

This was the first time that the Romans tooke vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masanisa well deserved : yet would not the Title haue redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recourred possession of his Countrie together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not vnlike-10 lie, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his Troupe of Horse, in such fort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuerthelesse haue recourred his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subjects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserued: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to beflow it that was their affured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masefyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberalitie of the Romans, was noy sed abroad as very glorious: and the Ro-20 mans themselues, in a politicke sort of gravitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if even their faluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great consequence. Hee thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the some of syphax ( of whom wee shall shortly speake more ) which held some piece of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were fo, that never any before him had made this a matter of fuit : yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein ; and answered very grauely, That 30 it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such Lindat. Kings, as had greatly descrued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in processe of time grew so proud of this their imaginarie prærogatiue, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by b that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or b cafarteen.

The Carthaginians desire Truce : and breake it.

He Carthaginians were extremely dismaied, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befalme their good friend Syphax; and vndergreat calamitie, that was betaine then good in the good from the flood that Masanissa, their mortall enemie, had got possession of his Kinodome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an ende of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their These being admitted into the presence of Printe Councell, to make this for peace. I there being admitted into the peace is a Exterpt. PreScipie, did not only protrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the effect of him, bb.lib.15.Lin.

and of those that sate in Councell with him. Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They con-Bbbbbb 2

fessed themselves to have vniustly broken the Peace betweene them and Rome; and to have deserved what so cuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly befought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their clemencie; which by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice deferued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal; who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno and the choice of his companie; 10 who had now their long defired worke in hand, of fuing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatfocuer they were, it must needes be that they were most infolent men ouer those that were subject vinto their power: for they would not have made such adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne necessitie; vnlesse they themselves had expe-Eted the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his affiftants, in what poore case the Citic of Rome then was; and how vnable to defraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in fuch ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately beene. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; 20 and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution; and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Vtica, a weaker Citic, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission and told them. That though he came into Africk, to make a Conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they defired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugi- 30 tiue flaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they should deliner up all their ships of warre, saue twentie; and That they should pay a great summe of monie, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barlie. To confider of these Articles, hee gaue them three dayes : and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might fend Embassadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Ma(anissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had beene alreadie at an end. Syphax was a little before fent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that 40 the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open, and an holy day appointed for thank sgiuing and supplication to their Gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happie successe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giving thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipie vnto their Mafter, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him; who by rendring them to libertie; should doe an act very plaulible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Mafant fain complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should to doe for him; they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and fent him two purple Caffocks, that had each of them one gold button; with fuch other Presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were thefe and Lelius gone from Rome; when the newescame, that Embassadours from Carthage were arrived to delire peace. These Embassadours were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lelius being fent for came backe from Offia, to bee present when their demands were to bee heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get respite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more casie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they faid, all things well confidered, did still remaine in force: neither had there fince beene any warre at all betweenethe people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head befieved and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that aduentured in like fort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italie. This being fo: their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this 20 tale; hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had beene fo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Luctatius, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all yong men ) and said. That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time; untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were lent home in companie of Lalius; without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answere. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybins, That the Senate receiving advertisment except. & Polyb. from Scipio, of that which had pailed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Lis.

30 Treatie of peace, approued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason bee beleeued: fince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most uncertaine issue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loft.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victualle the Roman Campe, was overtaken by foule weather at Sea; and hardly cleaping wracke, was dispersed, and dri-49 uen aground in diners parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather Appeleble out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuails in Carthage: which caused the people to Punico. crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a bootie escape them; faying that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was except. & Polybo the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the Rascalitie, together with Lis. so women and boyes, to be medling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in fuch tumults no leffe violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Adrabal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden ( for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the station whereto their Campe adioyned) and Bbbbbb 3 bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended; not only for the loffe, and for that the Towne was thereby relegued; but for that by this breach of truce, he forefaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he fent Embaffadours vnto them; both to require fatisfaction for the injuried one; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gauethe Cartinginians to vndersland, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (faid they ) we hold it strange, That yee, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before vs, and kiffed our feet, after an unufuall manner of humilitie, confessing your 10 lelues to have perfictiously broken the league that was betweene vs, and thereby to have deferued such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then uttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthie to be destroyed having only recourse unto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Yes were it not amisse. that yee should consider, how long hee hathbeene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians: where he is in a manner befieged, and unable to stirre: (othat yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it bee supposed, that he were now in Africke. and readie to give us bat taile; yet should it well agree with your wisdome, to doubt what might betall remembring that he is a man and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were 20 ouercome : what refuge have yee left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will yee either (weare by, to bee beleeved, or call upon in your miserie? what wordes, and lamentable gesture will yee hences oorth vse, to move compassion? Surely yee have alreadie wa-Ited all your forces of perswasion, and shall not againe deceive us, if ye refuse the grace whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angric. when they heard the felues vpbraided with the base demeanour of their Embasfadours. For it was not the general opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all inftification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that 30 the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was veelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in foill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furic of the multitude was in some fort appealed; either by Hanno, whom Appean (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very reucrence, due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in triendly fort, though it were without answere to their Proposition. There were allo two Galiles appointed for their safe Connoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. As drubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from 40 Carthige towards Vica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagrada. Their Convoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leave of them as if they had beene then in safety: fince the Roman Campe was even in fight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, for a fmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Afdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well 50 discerne his purpose; which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Aldrubal; they flipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet he gaue them chace; and had well-neare surprised them. But they discovered some

CHAP.3. S.20. of the Historie of the World.

Roman Companies on the shore ouer against them, and therefore adventured to run their veffell aground: whereby they faued their owne lines; though a great part of their companie were flame, or hurt. This practife of the Carthaginians was inexculable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driven to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatic: had they not been egiuen to vn-10 deritand, that Hannibal was alreadic landed in Africk, in whom they repoled no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune. and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipie, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

d. XX.

In what fort HANNIBAL spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doines of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO calledout of Italie. How the Romans were diverly affected by HANNI-BALS departure.

Ver fince the loffe of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Roman Consults that succeeded vnto Clausius and Linus, by whom Afarubal was ouercome and slaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Lieinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthse of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Conful who followed Licinius, and Cn. Ser-20 nilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were carnelly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by itealth; his care being more to preserue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherin they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warreto a short and happie conclusion. They stood neuerthelesse in much scare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who 40 tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago follicited alfothe Hetrurians; and found them foreadie to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong, it might have proved no lesse needfull for scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romansto employ one of their Confuls or Proconfuls, with an Armic, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: for a fruuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which fide Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago; when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrie of the Infubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconful, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these hee fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubt-full; in such fort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have haken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the fame time gaue a loud shout; and strained themselues hard; as if at that brunt the victoric should have beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beafts being fitter for such vie, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent. and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more availeable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. 10 Then fel the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This not with standing, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make refistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom her had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago faw that his men beganne to shrinke, Hee put himselfe in the head of his 20 Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length he received a grieuous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. He was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further rest. stance, prouided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fine thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides divers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of scruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, be-30 fore they had recovered some ground that might affure them from pursuit. How euer it were, this victorie would have much imported for the affurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilear to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing him selfe (by easie journies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to understand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthageit selse was readie to bee log. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armic, but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readic to burst out, whilest the Embassadours were delivering their errand. When their message was done; Hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bit innee come home, have long agoe done their best to hale mee out of italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that sould have enabled mee to manage the Warre here. Scirt of to therefore shall not need to bragge, that hee bath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this mobile leat; and our whelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the raine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse doubting that, which after came to passe; wherein he embarqued, besides his ownemen, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and resuled to doe service in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could take he flew; not sparing those that sled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuarie vnto thatday. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, than men are wont to bee, when they leave their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that he had not led his Armie from Canne, hotte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit Hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had lived almost halfe his time.

wherein he had lived almost halfe his time. If it could have beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke ) lesse earnestly haue preffed the Carthaginians to fend him over thither. When fure advertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgiving vnto their gods; and extraordinarie great sacrifices publikely made, for joy of such happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did ftill remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. 20 The remoue of the warre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victoric for which they hoped; was enough to make them prefume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Golde and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted: the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. V pon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from private men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those twelue Colonies, that for want cyther of meanes, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the 30 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to give double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to fet out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So consident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet suteable to the greatnesse of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the Battaile at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this not with standing, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had beene few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabins (who died about the same time) would bee found atrue Prophet. For be-49 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes : they found in the victories against Syphax and Asarubal no specialitie of such great worth, 29 might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such souldiors. Likewise Aldrubal, the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himfelfe by a swift retrait. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, 50 and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiors, but of brane Captaines, by them flaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, faying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had flaine Roman Prætors, yea and Confuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the fiege of Townes; briefly, that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer served in watre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

ANNIBAL disembarqued his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Ealtward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse, which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Ene-mie ; that hee might furnish himselse with this and the like needfull helpes, against theday of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychaus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Hor- 20 ses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie : making him understand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee casie for Masanisa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vied it, prevailed with Tycheus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezerallus, (the same who had made himselfe Protectour ouer Masanista his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to affaile the 30 places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Linie, came with more than fixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victorie affured. When they confidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by warre, But when they bethought themselues of their owne sufferings, which, for want of 40 Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out carneflly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his 50 Embassadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselues, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanista had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more belides all his owne forces would little auaile him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Whereforetaking such order as hee could vpon the sudden, for the safetie of his owne Kingdome; with fourethousand Horse, and fixe thousand Poot, hee made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadours 10 that had beene at Rame, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lettus and Fulmus: who brought them fafe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaned themselues towards the Roman Embaliadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answere for such notorious outrage. To consirme them in this

M. Babius one of the late Embassadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands upon them, and detained them; fending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthagimans might bee repaid in 20 their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Babius to yie them with all possible courteile, and fend them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caufed them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans. This not with flanding, He made more cruell warre vpou them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to facke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by attault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatfoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselues terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they 30 had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne Exerpt, & Polyb, athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies afunder, as men delighted in shedding of bloud. This being their practife at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of crueltie; when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent foorth his Scowts and Spies, to discouct where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in Head of trusfing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one 40 to conduct them vp and downe, and show them what socier they desired. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and fent them away fafe vnto their Generall. Hannibal understanding this, admired the braucric and courage of his Enemie: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference; and fignified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answere, that Hee would meet him shortly in place connenient. The next day Masanisa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remoued voto a Towne called Nadagara; neare voto which hee fat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time 50 and place did fitly ferue, if He had ought to fay to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemie: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things elfe; excepting that his men were drinen to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode foorth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well fearched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to fland off: and themselues, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while filent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, faluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africke and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Flects as had beene lost, and of so much bloud as had beene to shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisedome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde your vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet ( said He ) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to 20 teach thee moderation. For I am that same HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Canna wanne the greatest part of Italie; and deuised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome: which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles. as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant us peace. This may forue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I fought with thy Father, Scipio: Hee we the first of the Roman Generals, that ever met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I (bould have fuch businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is even one of Fortunes Pageants. whereof shee hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke upon M. ATILIVS. If hee would have hearkened unto such 20 perswasions, as Inow vee to thee; hee might have returned home to Rome an happy man. And so mailt thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and what soeuer Hands else are situate betweene Italie and Africk, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever; and left wate the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt have glorie enough by effecting thus much : and the Romans may well be glad of fuch a bargaine. As for vs : our owne quiet shall henceforth gine vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, Shall make vs faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all toolittle, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou must undergoe, for the obtaining of avery little more than that which thou mailthaue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay holde upon 40 good Fortune, if it please thee: say but till to morrow night and thou must take such fortune, as it shall please the gods. The issue of battaile is uncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steele we shall each of us bring into the field : but of the victory, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me. that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I HANNIBAL that now desire peace with thee which I would never doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I have maintained unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie mee, the Warre by me begunne. Hereunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had mooued the Romans to enter into this or the former 50 Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most just. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he said, that he was not thereofignorant; and that with-

CHAP.2. S. 21. of the Historie of the World. out any note of infolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all thefe Countries, with which the Carthaginians now fo willingly departed, were alreadie wonne from them by the Romans? If, faid He, thefe Conattions had beene propounded whileft as yet yee detained some part of Italie, they might peradventure not have beene rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians have yeelded alreadie, and thought mee to deale graciously in being fo moderate. Rather I fay, that the injuries which they have done me fince, have made them unworth eo; obtaining peace pron to friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldest be 10 glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in tike fort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or fauers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well that befides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto vs ransome-free all prisoners that they have of ours; to pay us pue thousand Talents; to deliver up their Callies; and to deliner hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadours 2 Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these insuries newly done: then will I take advice with my Councell what answere to give you; otherwise, you may even prepare for warre, and blame your

20 owne felues, for that I have denied you peace. Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable March, and such as hath very seldome beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Haftaty, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein 30 Scipia altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastaty, that so the Hastar, as was vivall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, asit were, in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight. Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselues over-charged, eyther by the Enemies, or (which was most to bee fea-40 red ) by the Elephants, they should runne backethrough those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able. should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armic: thereby leaning roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to faue themselves on the word ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the fecond and third Battailes, without cloying up the way betweene the Maniples. which he defired to keepe open. His Italian Horschee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lalius. In the right wing was Wafanisa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, fince their comming 30 into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end; and that their victoriem this warre; thould make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to refilt them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe neyther was there any place in

Africk, that would give them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would live like wretched slaves under most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessitie, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never beene knowne to saile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore. in Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want 10 of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had served him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lalius, in his owner right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tychaus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Ma (anilla. He was indeede farre too weake for the Finemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychans and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the source thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than fuch as could be levied in the hafte of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that 20 had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neyther had hee perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done. was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with fixteene thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horse: the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that hee reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought preater wonders, when it was more frongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall 20 conditions : promiting vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards : threatning the Carthaginians with ineuitable feruitude, if they loft that day, but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers by the thany victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had flaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio. even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very work of the Romane Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of fundry battailes, could no longer be trufted to beare Armes in their owne 40 Countrie. As for the reft: they were your men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chaced. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day striue to make good their honour; and to purchase the same of meninumcible

Such exhortations vied the two Generalisbefore the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horfemen on both fides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake upon the Ramanet. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an uncertaine kinde of helps) those that shoot neare unto the point of 50 the left wing, runned backe sonsen: and kanne upon their owne Numidian Horse; which they aftrighted and displaced. Malanisa epoints they aftrighted and displaced. Malanisa epoints the same numidians; and not suffering them to getally them shirts; draw them quite out of the field. The rest of these beasts made agrees spoile of the Roman relites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing : against whom they gaue to Lalius the same aduantage, that Masanissa had against the Numidians; which hee vied in like fort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote advanced, and drew neere together with a flow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what 10 time they gave a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to have the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastaty, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselves readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercinaries received no manner of helpe or confort, from those that should have seconded them. For the newleuied Carthaginians and Africans, when they faw their hired fouldiers give backe, did also themselues retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke 20 themselues betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way vnto the Mercinaries for their faferetrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chaced by the Romanes, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse surie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercinaries. The Romane Hastaty in like fort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp 30 vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the cares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or faue these Runne-awaies He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne lide, that would have rushed vpon him: whom hee thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romanes were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with such thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with bloud: that Scipio began to fland 40 in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissoluted in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remayning yet entire, and without seare expecting him; He might be well affured to receive a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastain to make a fland there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarij: Hee placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastaty, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had beene received in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to have beene onely a matter of passione; in regard of the sharpe 50 Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romanes were encouraged, by their having prevailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But the feold Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; butrather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was uncertaine which part had the worse: unlesse it may seeme, that the Romanes were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masanissa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have beene most happie and in a needfulltime. These upon the sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and overbearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there dyed of the Romanes fifteene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian fide, aboue twentic thouland, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sepater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Linie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemics were too strong 10 for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as hee was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disaduantage, he could worke no maruels. He sauch himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Advanctum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had beene absent sixe and thirtie yeares. At his comming into the Senate He said plainly. That there was none other way lest, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolued to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of bur- 20 den. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before. Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrific the Citie, than with any hopeto take it His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Octavius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then fending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie. He fet faile from Vica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embaffadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vse the pittifull gelture of suppliants. But they received none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would give them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Viica, and called backe Octaviiis thither, with whom 30 in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the fonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were alreadie vanquished. This Vermina feemes to have beene both careleffe of getting intelligence how things paffed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him : which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken priloners. If this good companie had beene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have beene farre better conducted, and might well have changed 40 the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loft, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, though it were no great accesse vnto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadours from Carthage; whose behauiour though it was more pitifull than it had beene before; yet procured it leffe commiscration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like fort humbled themselves. Neverthelesse it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio flood in great doubt, left the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his handes; and given to 50 one of the Confuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Conful who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to rettraine the ambition of this Conful Seruilsus. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made fuite for the same Province of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet hee needes would begoing, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that hee being Conful might iovne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could have his Fleete and all things in a readinesse for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tolt at Sea with foule weather, first voon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consultap 10 expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victoric obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end . Yet was Lentalus the new Conful to pathonate, in defiring Africk for his Prouince, That hee said hee would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, untill heehad first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Conful at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answere vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had descrued: and in regard 20 thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall, in that hee was contented to leave vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also vnto them their possession Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the rest hee was at a point, That, before hee cyther granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treatic was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediatly they should deliuer up unto the Romanes all Prisoners, Fugitines, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewife all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thence-forth out of Africk, neither 30 yet within Africk, without licence of the Romanes: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatfocuer, belonging any wife unto MASANISSA, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him: That they should finde corne for the Romane Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under foure-

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home; and reported them vnto the Citie. They were verie vnpleasing; and therefore one Gisco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hamibal perceiuing this and noting withall what sauourable audience was given to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hamibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them: saying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; forassmuch as he had been ethence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of sine and forty. Hauing thus excused himselfe of the disorso der, Hediscoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept

50 der, Hediscoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good advice, they resolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand five and twentie thousand pound weight of Silver, in recompense of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths: in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Hee gaue injunction, that they should nevther in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embasfadours to them sent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wife and honorable nen, by the mileries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counfales. Aldrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They 10 went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waitawhile for audience, till the election of new Confuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romanes had lately fignified vnto their King that they found themselues grieued; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius: who being one of the three Embañadours, that had lately beene fent from Rome vnto King Philip, 20 tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there lenying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between chim and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sepater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately scrued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio; might be released. and delinered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had fent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answere. Hee faid, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subjection. As for Sopater: He affirmed him to be one 30 of the Kings Counsaile, and vericinward with him; one that served not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadour's could make vnto the Senate no good answere: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee sought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as hee had begunne. For in two maine pointes Hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romanes : first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Ea-40 sterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate : and Afarubal aboue the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romanes from necessitic of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could be not altogether excuse the Citie; that had beene too vehement in the profecution of bad counfaile. But if Hanno and himfelfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the 50 moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had beene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the dinerfitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Persurie, as they themselves might have laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had beene such as the Romanes was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would Iweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afdrubal made answere; Euen by the same gods, that are to fenere unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentalus the Conful interpoling the authoritie of his Office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making warrein Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Com-10 mand of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with ten Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countrimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embafsadours would choose, should be sent ouer into Africk, and be freely restored to li-20 bertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in Commission. At their comming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romanes, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romanes hee crucified. About the first payment of their money; the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could 30 haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet fince the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeares; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collecting of the fumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romane yoke had begunne to pinch them; fo as many, even of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when hee was checked by Adrubal Hadus and tolde, That it worst of all beseemed him to laugh, since hee had beene the cause why all others did weepe; Hecanswered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Tet faid Hee, My langhter is more seasonable, and lesse abfurd, than your teares. For yee should have wept, when yee gave up your Shippes and Ele-40 phants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vie of Armes; without the good leane of the Romanes first obtained . This miferable condition keepes vs under; and holds vs in affured feruitude. But of the sematters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, yee have thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee [hall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miferie, for which yee have shed these teares. Thus discoursed Hannibal vnto those, who taffing the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grieuous discale, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeauours had been employed in procuring the remedie.

50 Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Mafanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vindeseruedly. To him also hee configned ouer those Townes of King Syphax, which the Romanes at that prefent held: wherein, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise hee knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romanes, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deferuings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romanes embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybaum, Scipio with fome part of his Armic tooke his way home to Rome by land; and fent the reft before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italie was no leffe glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the Citie in Triumph : neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with fo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citic in this 10 Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether he were dead awhile before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romanes, to insult ouer the calamities of mightic Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall have better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neyther the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that gricuous warre past, whereof the Romanes had beene in a manner without hope. that ever they should set Italie free. This made them looke cheerefully upon the Author of fo great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could 20 moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honorable kind of surname. taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse described especially by many of the Casars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if fuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue vnto Setpiothe African.

Plut, in vita

F the great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath beene affigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, 50 we are lesse to wonder, if we find lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious unto humane power; and fince they are the same affections, by which the wills of fundrie men are ouer-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans inuaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and threefcore thousand horse: but fayling in their intended conquest, they became fubiect within a while themselues vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with fuch numbers of men, as might haue seemed resiltlesse. But after that the Persus were beaten home, their Empire was never secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leasure from intestine warre deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great 10 Alexander. If Nabuchadona for with his rough old fouldiours, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the iffue might, in humanereason, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then have beene expedient for them, to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though leffe renowned, than their owne. For the menacing wordes vied by Crus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabucho dono for like wife offended the Mides and Persians) were not so qualleableto victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decayin strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; 20 being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Affe. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse understanding the language of Fame: and despiling the vertue that makes little noise, aduenture to prouoke it against themselves, as if it were not possible that their owne glory should be soyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodach, had itumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dash his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldiour than any other Greekish King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vndertooke as it were for his mindes sake: having received no injurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that served vnder him, to 30 preuaile so catily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus; had found their owne vertue to bee of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and what soeuer else had serued to make him terrible ) serue onely to make the Romans, in time following, tothinke more highly of themselues. *For fince they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him; that, being *The King of The tince they had ouercome the best wanted himselfe Lord of Greece and Macethus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macethus beaten by them, could be a yeer after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macethus beaten by them, could be a yeer after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macethus beaten by them. don: what should finder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, cible Nauie, which in compasse of twelue yeeresa Macedonian King of late memory had won? being beaten which in compatie or tweine yeeres a macedoman King of late memory, had won't out of the Brido Certainly there was hereunto requilite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotifi feas, inuition by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece : all the rest, this done, ted yes to those would follow of itselfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had of Spaine; and having broken shauing broke fhewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more ac-the greatest

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soone after the gathered toquaintance with the Nation. wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leifure to hear-gether; wee kenafter newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should bee on neuer made account of a count of a coun that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet : and were become, though ayoihis prenot otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as hap- parations after 50 pily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the same time cruell warre vpon the Greekes: wasting their Country, and sacking their Townes, only because they were vnable to relist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not flow to give theme cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with 6.7.

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embasfadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they . had undertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romanes: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose bufinesse with them being now the subiect of our storic, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefely) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busine time in the world, when, within the space of source yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three 10 of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened from the third yeare of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Agypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being lixteene or seuenteene yeares old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans and most of the Greekes; by the deccase of his Vncle Antigonus Roson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia, Ly- 20 cureus found meanes to make himselse King ouer the Lacedamonians, whose Common weale, fince the flight of Cleamenes, had continued in a manner headleffe; and Acheus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiadit was, that open war brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invalion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have alreadie followed vnto an end : Of Antrochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romanes finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly de- 30 fired of the Achems, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian than it should have beene to the Spartan; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Atolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons therof. These Etolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their confanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inualion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater 40 ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans, were called by the Meffenians to helpe : which they did the more willingly; because the Atolians passing without leauethrough their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they lifted . Olde Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most vingratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to stay a few dayes untill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselse a man fitter (as hath beene alreadic no- 50 ted of him) for any other feruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recourred ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

Lib. s. chap. 2.

CHAP.4. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

So they departed home rich, and well animated to return againe. As for the Acheans; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Meffentans: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulle of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There iouned with them in this their fecond Innalion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of fetting out no thips of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of chap. 3. $. 14 to the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and tell upon the Hands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaid., or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could elfe-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Etolians into Peloponne fue: who made greater hauocke in the Countrie now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any relistance. Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselues with some speedie reuenge: 20 there were that vrged to have some gricuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedamonians: who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Atolians, in meere defpight of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slue such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: fince their Towne was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soone to appeale, and meant alwayes to remaine at his denotion. Philip was casily satisfied with this: not for that 30 he (orratherold Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did miffe-vnderstand the Lacedamonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Acheans, Baotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Atolians: and desiring to have warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip fent his letters vnto the Atolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time a if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpole: whither if it pleased him to come or fend, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. 40 But when the Etolians understood this for certaintie, they adjourned the Councell vnto a further time: faying, That such weightie matters ought not to be handled, faue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law not with standing, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had described it, made election of Scopes to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invalions made on Pelsponne/ws; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must biane laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike. After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared builly for the warre 2 gainst the year following. He also affayed the Hyrian, Scot diluidas, with faire words and promifes: whom he casily won from the Etolian fide, forasmuch as the Etolia 5 0 was had coulened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like fort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre intheir owne Country, sent unto the Acarnanian, Epirots, Meffenians, and Lacedamo-mins:requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vinto the Etolians; without flaying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they received

So

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be defired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embasfadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they . had vndertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romanes: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them being now the subiect of our storic, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefely) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busic time in the world, when, within the space of source yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three 10 of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened from the third yeare of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Agypt vnto his father Energetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being fixteene or seuenteene yeares old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans and most of the Greekes; by the deccase of his Vncle Antigonus Roson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Ly- 20 cureus found meanes to make himselse King ouer the Lacedamonians, whose Common weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Tauris, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiadit was, that open war brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invalion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we have alreadie followed vnto an end : Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romanes finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponne sus; greatly de- 30 fired of the Achains, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subicction vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leffe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Atolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons therof. These Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Mellenians that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their confanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the prefent in Peloponne [us. Their inualion was no leffe vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater 40 ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achains, were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Atolians passing without leave through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they lifted. Olde Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most vingratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to stay a few dayes vntill the time of his owne Office came; being Lib. 5. chap. 2. chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselse a man fitter (as hath beene alreadie no- 50 ted of him ) for any other service, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootic, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recourred ground of advantage, that they eafily defeated all his Armie.

CHAP.4. S. 1. of the Historie of the World.

So they departed homerich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaans; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulle of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There toyned with them in this their fecond Innation a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of fetting out no thips of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of chap. 3. $. 1. to the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and tell voon the llands of the Cyclades in the Egean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Seerdilaid w, or Seerdiletus, having gotten what they could elfe-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Atolians into Peloponnesiu: who made greater hauocke in the Countrie now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any relistance. Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselues with some speedie reuenge: 20 there were that vrged to have some gricuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedamontans: who were thought vnder-hand to have favoured the Atolians, in meere despight of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselues had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedamonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they slue such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselues to judgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: fince their Towne was lately much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his denotion. Philip was casily satisfied with this: not forthat 30 he (orrather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did miffe-vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Acheans, Beetians, Photians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Atolians: and desiring to have warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip fent his letters vnto the Atolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time ; if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that

them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. 40 But when the Etolians understood this for certaintie, they adious ned the Councell vnto a further time: faying, That fuch weightie matters ought not to be handled, faue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law not with standing, open warrejwas proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had described it, made election of Scopes to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inradious made on Peleponne sus; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must biane laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike. After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared builly for the warre againstithe yeer of tollowing. He also affayed the Hyrian, Seet dilaidas, with faire words and promiles: whom he cally won from the Etolian fied, forafmuch as the Etolia purpole: whither it it pleased him to come or fend, hee should be well informed of

5 ours had coulened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies In like fort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre intheir owne Country, fent unto the Acarnanian: , Epirots, Meffenians, and Lacedamomans:requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre virto the Etolians; without flaying (as it were) to await the euent. Hercunto they received

diuerse answeres, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they flood in continuall danger; faid, that they could not honeftly refuse to show their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall affent. The Epirots that were more mightie, were neverthelesse more cunning and referued : so that they stood vpon a needlesse point; and desired to bee held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaime the warre. The Meffensans, for whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atelians held vpon their borders, and faid, that they durft not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle 10 were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians; the chiefe of them fludied onely how to mannage that treason, for which their Citie had beene so lately pardoned: and therefore difinissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answere at all. They had three yeares together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting fill when Cleomenes should returne out of Agypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their Citie. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safetic to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferued them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps not a little moued with respect of the 20 benefit, which might redound vnto themselves, by adhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuising, how to make all readie for Cleomenes against his returne; and therefore fought to loyne with the Atolians, which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authoritie, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate; and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neyther did it fuffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: sancying vnto themselues the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. 30 Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deferring vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than fubiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre leffe by him respected, than were the Achaans, Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Etolians to fend an Embaffie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation 40 and hot there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie and these their oppofites: in fuch wife that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maffacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Liolians, the diversitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedamonians and Alolians : without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans ; who had spared the Citie, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King; that we may inftly wonder, how they grew fo carelesse in making chayce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agesipolis; the sonne of Agesipolis the son 50 of King Cleembrotus: and him they admitted to raigne over them; as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Agespolis was a yong boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernment. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong soeuer, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in observation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall samily, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime; but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed upon each of the Ephori a Talent, and thereby made himselse be salved King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Herenles. This Lycurgus, to gratise his Partisans, and to approve his worth by Action; invaded the Countrie of the Argines: which lay open and ungarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne divers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedemon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Etolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Arginess.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwife, than the Acheans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readie: the Epirots gaue vncertaine answere: the Olessenians would not firre: all the burden must lie vpon themselues and the poore Acamanians, whom the Atolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and 20 by helpe of the Lacedemonians, could affaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Atolians, paffing ouer the Bay of Corinth, furprised the Towne of Agira: which it they could have held, they should thereby gricuously have molested the Achaens; for that it Rood in the mid-way betweene Agium and Siegen two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrie. But as Ægira was taken by surprise : so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile; whilest they that should have made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselues, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedleffely to ranfack private houses, and thereby gaue the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great flaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About 30 the same time, another Atolian Armic landing among the Eleans, fell vpou the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territoric of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Confederacie. The Dymans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders, but were so well beaten, that the enemie grew bolder with them than before. They fent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achesns having lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselues: neither could they get any firength of Mercinaties; for a funch as at the end of Cleomemes his war, they had couetoully with held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disabilitie of the Achesns, and insufficiencie of their 40 Pretor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretolore made for the publike service, and to convert the monie to their owne defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedemonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands, for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselues Masters of Ambracia. There he spent fortie dayes, see he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the beatt of Etoliaat his first comming; it was thought that he might have made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to have their own desires suffilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their casine which they never intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their casine.

dessignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eightled aside, and quite out of his way. by Maximilian the Emperour to the fiege of Tournay: at fuch time as the French King Leves the twelfth, hearing that the itrong Citie of Terwin was loft, and that of his Cauellerie, wherein rested his chiefe considence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Effex with feuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Atolians: in such fort, as their Prætor Scopus adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Agean 10 Sea: which being for laken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the reft, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrimen at his returne; for a funch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip having difpatched his worke at Ambracus, made a strong inuasion vpon Atolia. Hee tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Elaus, and divers other Townes and Castles 20 of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the . Ata. lians in fundrie skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiping any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnelus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently sollicited by the Achaan Embassadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were readic with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. These Dardantans were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seeke bootie in that wealthic Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journic into Peloponnesus: they purposed in his absence, which they 30 thought would beelong, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrie; as had beene their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achean Embassadours, (whom hee should have accompanied home with his Armie ) and to bid them have patience vntill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readic, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like confiderations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose 40 Counsailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Maceden, towardes which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Lariffa in Thessale, whilest his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Etolians rested not. They avenged themselues upon the Epirois: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Atolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid afide: Philip stole a journie into Peloponnesus. with fine thousand Foot, and about four hundred Horse. As soone as hee was 50 within Corinth; He comanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might bee carried foorth of his arrivall. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him; with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, hee would have the Achaan Souldiors readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with fomewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare : since the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Atolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewise hee purchased both reputation and loue, by divers actions immediatly following. He wanne P/ophu, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wanne it by affault at his first comming : wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an unseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of prouiding even fuch flore of weapons, as might have ferued to defend it. I he Towne was preferued by the King from facke; and given to the Achsens, of his owne meere motion. before they requested it. Thence went he to Lifton, which yielded for very feare; hearing how easily he had taken Psophis This Towncalso he gaue to the Acheans. The like liberality he ysed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to hulbandrie, and lived abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the 20 Citie of Olympia: where having done facrifice to Iupiter, feafted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes; Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of flaues, and much wealth of all forts, fuch as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his journie, by fending Embassadours to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to let themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patro-30 nage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Etolian Captaines; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the tharpenedle of Winter would fuffer him to stay there dayes. Fainche would have fought with the Atolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not overtake them, vntill they had covered themselves within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to have beene safe. But Philip affaulted them therein so forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their lives and armes. Having performed fo much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter. Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponne fus, the Lacedemonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with monie: fo was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Vsurpersare commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselse to have best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by 50 propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephorias they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: wo perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as cuen whilft he was vling his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went. and shifted presently away. So hee lined afterwards among the Acheans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to drive out his fellow King yong Agelipalis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such fort as once he should have beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though 10 his actions hitherto might have beene defended; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into judgement, hee chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friendes the Atolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weakness of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vuto him selfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tvrant, and was fo acknowledged ) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions hee got the name of a T yrant : or at what time it was, that he chaced Agelipolis out of the Ci- 20 tie. I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was towards some private Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaued himselse as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

Hilest the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following; some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their owne greatnesses, as they were like to have spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Gounsailors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. 40

The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable peece of service to his Prince; is he could reduce the Acheans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passes out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the Dacedonians to thrust the Acheans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastice some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to 50 passes his his possible to hat they should be equalified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Acheans were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoned themselves vinto old Arasus; and belought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus foorthwith dealt carnessly with the King; as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King beltowed gracious words vponthole that had bene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he diffembled his cholier for atime. He thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doc the King any valuable service, in butinesse or other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereaster to beginne at the head; since, in bito ting at the taile, the filh had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Acheans there were lome, who bore no heartic affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promiling to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselse: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Acheans, and, asit were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, bec quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By 20 luch perswasions, He drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Pixtor. There with much more labour, than would have beene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire word; and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Fauorites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthe, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very frong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yeelded it vp for feare, at his first comming: whereof hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as hee pre-

30 fently did. The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them forfake their alliance with the Atolians, and joyne with him voon reasonable termes. This if they could be cotented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them understand. That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which hee had of theirs; That he would desend them from all forrein inuation; and that they should hold their libertic entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tri-40 bute, or being kept vnder by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be defpiled, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion vpon their Countrie then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleeue such faire promises) to sufpect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was fet on worke for no other ende, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Atolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Atolia, But hee perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for him elfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was faid) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which be had made vnto them 50 by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus.

He faid that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be

be very præjudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the denotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a falle lie; denifed by Apelles himfelfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no fooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee fent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearfe it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did fo, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when he had faid all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; Hee added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath tound you such vngratefull wretches: it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaans; and therein having made it to knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your sclues. Olde Aratus gravely admonished the King; That when soeuer hee heard any accusation. especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth. He should forbeare a while to give credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should never thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidemus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very abfurd thing. That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans rea, and anothers no. Hercof the King liked well; and faid that he would make 20 sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befalne him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere denice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could

The vnrestfull temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe, began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous 20 for want of his free motion. Hee betakes him felfe to his cunning againe; and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arati; so fayling of them, he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himfelfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtile workemanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponne (us, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and fuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the 40 Tarquesiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to bee at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and prinie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vied more finenesse: loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as wee fay, Out of Gods blessing into awarme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbcaring to meddle in affaires of State. As for the 50 new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore 2 great deale of time was loft, whileft Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his owne errour; which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achaans to rejourne their Parliament from Agium, to Sicyon the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past, & laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, Hee casily obtained what hee would of the Acheans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne : and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide (hipping, that so hee might inuade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedamonians, that were maritime people, at his pleafure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; even by the ministery of those whom hee most hated. Wherefore hee entred into conspiracie with Leontins and Megaleus: binding himselfe and them by oath, to croffe and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilest he was a childe; and therefore these wise men perswaded them-20 felues, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their owne milgouernement of his affaires, they might rule him as a child fill. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines : Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Atolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiese would have fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought itenough to leave the Achaans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. He 30 himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sca, landed in the Isle of Cephallenia: whence the Atolians, dwelling over against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he belieged the Towne of Palas, that had been very serviceable to the Enemic against him and his Consederates; and might beevery vse-full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene ships of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts faue one, on which fide Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was ap-40 pointed by the King to make the affault. But hee, remembring his couenant with Apelles; did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many flaine; not of the worst fouldiers, but fuch as had gotten ouer the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this; but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was casier vnto the Townes-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed, and uncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard voon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Meffenians alleadged, that Lyeurgus was busic in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etelian windes which then blew, feruing fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would cassly carrie him thither, so would they

Summer to small purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee shewed how vositting it were, to let the Atolians ouer-run all Thessalie againe, and fome part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he faid, that the time now ferued well to carry the warre into Actolia; fince the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets saile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Actolians from Acarnania The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as 10 could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to affure his Retrait; Hee passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vie to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careleffe in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there 20 was nothing else to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that hee thought the paines of his iournie well recompenced. So hee loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple. the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Astolians; in remembrance of the like their courtelie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would doe, hee beleeued before; and therefore was not taken vna wares. Three thousand of them there were 20 that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laide a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians, who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backes of the Atalians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with flaughter of the enemie, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee fafely carried all that hee had gotten aboord his Fleet. Once the Actolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious Expedition being enery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finister accident; it pleased the King to 40 make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leonisus, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heavie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieued them to thinke, that they should bee able to give no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The forrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselues with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing flones at him. fo that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as 50 happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paffed. Which made him fend for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their diforder; and they, to give him froward answeres: insomuch as they faid at length, That they would neuer give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee described. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles; and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, It was even I. This resolute anfwere, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both fad and angrie; feeing himselfe out frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after, Megaleas was called forth to his answere, and was charged by Aratus with mato ny great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leffe touching Leontius, that flood by as a looker on than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answeres thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done

vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth. Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacademonians. These and the Eleans had done what harmethey could in Peloponnesus, whilest the King was 20 absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; wi. hill successe: yet fo, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would have done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedemon; and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, cre men could well beleeve that he was returned out of Atolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and having beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, flaues, and other Countrie-spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Atolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the Ltolians; who, if they would 30 make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Ætolians had spedill that yeere: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had fent forth to wall The false and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grieuously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should bee able to hold out; fince they were not strong enough to keepe the feild, but had alreadic suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would 40 make them glad, each, to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Etalians readily entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadours, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchfafe to come, they promised that hee should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raifing sedition against him in the Armie. But this device sorted to no good effect. The fouldiours were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded 50 with so much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of dores; without further harmedone. This was enough to informe the king ( who casily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yeathe souldiours themfelues, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought

The Ætolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow;

ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuerthelesse being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold upon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Magaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and therevpon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this viquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherfore he willed his Confederates, to lay a-10 fide all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following, wherein hee hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian fouldiors, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthie to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build in their fauour

with the Multitude. During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan some bordering Townes; from which 20 the Dardanians, Etolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus prouided for fatetie of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embaffadours from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Agypt, and from the Citic of Byzantium, recontinuing the former follicitation about the Peace. This fashion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, cuer since the Kings that raigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to fet the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but prefently there were found intercellours, who pittying the effusion of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduan-30 tage. By doing such friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people, that were how soener weake in numbers, ver very good fouldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward fort, especially the Etolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours : being well affured that if they had the worft, The love of Greece would be sufficient to redeeme their quiet. They had, fince the late Treatic of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to bee more foundly beaten at home, they defired now, more carneftly than before, to make an end of the warre as foone as they might. Philip made fuch answere to the Embassa-40 dours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it : but that the Ætolians, if they had a defire to live in rest, must first be dealt withall, to fignific plainly their determination, whereto himfelfe would returne fuch anfwere as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Maccdon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the Battaile at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly o encouraged him to take part with Hannibal; and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the £tolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an £tolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about sinishing war between them-

felues, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to bee doubted. that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Etolians then give, when they flood in feare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their owne good counsel, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, wherby they brought 10 themselues and the whole Countrie, (but themselues before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That enery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

d. III.

PHILIP, at the persuasion of DEMETRIVS PHARIVS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene HANNIBAL and PHILIP.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themfelues to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which hee joyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before: Demetrius Pha-rius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to bee auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne loft Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, 30 that wasin a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps have brought them to peace vpon some equal termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caufed each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The iffue of the counsaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Atolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punick 40 warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may feeme not unworthic to be read, if onely in regard of the formeit selse then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to have beene inserted into a more busie peece.

Kings, Cities, and States, with whom Wee hold alreadie league and friendship. To this League if VVe or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall bemade by our common consent.

ò. IIII.

How PHILIP yeelded to his natural vices being therein foothed by DEMETRIVS PHARIUS. His desire to tyrannize vponthe free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whileft he bore a part in the fecond Puniske warre. He poisoneth ARATVS: and growes hatefull to the Acheans.

Itherto Philip had carried himfelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdome, he might haue offered his with more commendation of his wildome, he might have one to the friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires : and thereby shortly gouerned him, euen as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed fuch as they feemed. He was luftfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what hee listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what hee ought, than so farre foorth, as by making a faire shew he might breede in 30 men such a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subjection. Hercunto Apelles had aduised him before; and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deepely wronged if he might not wholy bauchis owne way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and 49 more in credit: fo as, without any manner of contention, bec supplanted Aratus:

which the violence of Apelles could never doc. There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forrein warre) vnto domesticall obiects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proceile of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: refoluing fo to end the matter, that they should not hencefoorth striue any more about their Gouernment: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busic among them 50 to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherfore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with fuch of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing : and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the infolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwife, in talking with the heades of the po-become his Enemies. To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike, thencefoorth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom he thought more fro- 40 ward than befeemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man defirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discourred his T yrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in reforting to his house. He had beene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leifure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponne sus.

it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith

vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must lose all the other

Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his foul-diers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good

wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this journie He found by experience what Aratus had latelv told him: That vnhonest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appea- 50 rance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes have them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee feized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not feeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of settling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whileft he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Etolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him. Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee have related before, in chap.3.5.13. to place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leifure ferued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former defire, of oppreffing the libertic of the Mef-(entans; but made another journie into their Countrie, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hastie to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, Hee went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailor, and Flatterer, not his 20 peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angrie he waxed against those, that seemed not to fauour hisiniurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poyfoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poyfoned also the yonger Aratus; hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achsia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to bee celebrated euery yeeretwice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to bee translated into the number of 3 othe gods. Hereunto they are faid to have beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have beene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is never failing to the increase of Idolatrie. The louing memoric of Aratus their Patron, and lingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a marueilous diflike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counfaile for themselues. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleeved: neither were they in case to subsist, without his help that had comitted it. The Lelians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soone 40 divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Ætolians should have the country and townes; but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaues. The Achaans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make fireight alliance with the Etolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more auerse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for fuch did the Grèckes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The same consideration moued also the Lacedamonians, to stand off awhile. beforethey would declare themselues for the Atolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie therefore of Philip, and the great care 50 which he seemed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them:

especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselsethe Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit : recoucring their Towne, after it had beene taken by the Romans and Etolians; and redeeming their people wherefocuer they might bee found, that had beene carried away Captiue, Eccece 3

Captine, and fold abroad for flaues. Thus might he have blotted out the memoric of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not other whiles broken out, and given men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other soule acts. whereof he was not alhamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ferue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of fuch faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time for of that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

ð. V.

Of PHILOPOEMEN Generall of the Acheans : and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedamon. A battaile betweene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is flaine.

T happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there flood vp Philopamen: 20 whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopamen: who being then a yong man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleamenes. Thence-forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldome or neuer at peace betweene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confede- 30 racic to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of service, that hee made the Acheans very strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation. Hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Acheans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, housholdstuffe, and curious fare, and to pellow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiours; and suteable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hi-40 therto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afarre off: that were vsefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hastic Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driven to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopamen altered this: causing them to arme themfelues more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had beene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the scruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the 50 Acheans : when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make triall, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succesfor ynto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. Hekept in pay a strong Armie of Mercinaries : and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfeperforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Acheans, that were fauourers of libertie; but to firengthen himselse by friendship of the Atolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no turther notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inucterate hatred vnto the Argines, Acheans, and Macedonians; were in like fort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ltolian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordinip of Peloponness; they hindred themselves thereby from recoucring the Mastrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, toto gether with the regard of his owne fecuritie, and no fmall hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him alwayes ready to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whileft they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts. or some other opposition made against him, had vsually made him taile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Acheans; and thought his owne men better Souldiours than were theirs.

of the Historie of the World,

CHAP.4. S.5.

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, hee entred the Countrie of the

Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea 20 and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as having stronger friendes, * Except. è and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopamen was readic to Polybel. 11. entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. Plut in vita

The Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopamen sent foorth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Achans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no 30 otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interpolition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not onely by their advantage of number, but (as Poly- Polybibid. bius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein vsually the hired souldiers of T yrants exceed those that are waged by free States.

For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which live oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) 40 to affure their owne scruitude: so the Mercinaries of a T yrant, being made parta-kers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, have good cause to maintaine his quarrellas their owne; whereas they that ferue vnder a free State, have no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are prefently cast; and therefore such good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore stands in searc of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to give ground, so were veged to violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they be-tooke themselves to flight and could not bee staid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achaans. This disaster had beene sufficient to take from Philopamen the honour of the day; had hee not wisely obscrued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedamonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of fight: Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedamonians that flood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed ) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedamonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achaans; who had in a manner alreadie loft the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them re- 10 covered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest began to shrinke: so as Philopamen getting ouer the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vie his advantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he faw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustic Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achaans in diforder; and to fet vpon their backes, as they 20 were careleffely pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie faw Philopæmen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was eafily discovered by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge vnto another, coafted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it felfe, as he was getting ouer it, flew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedemonians side about fourethousand and more than fourethousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaan Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was 20 not greatly cared for; fince that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should have need.

Y this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselues. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (fuch was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferiour to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Atolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very necrely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done 50 him feruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Atolians in warre against him. This

CHAP.4. S.G. of the Historie of the World.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Phileterus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which hee had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to bee the more eneemed; as great men in thole times reposed much confidence in Eunnehes, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wines or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monic and accompts. But 10 when at length hee flood in feare of this King, that grew a blondie Tyrant: Hee fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The towns and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was readie to give Lyfmachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleneus having flaine Lylimachus, died shortly after himselse, before he made vse of Phileterus or his monic. So this Eunuch till retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren; of which the elder is faid to have been a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philet.e-20 rus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his advantage of the diffension. betweene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes; and wan the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that served under his Enemie, he used a pretie deuice. He wrote the word * VICTORIE vpon the hand of his Soothfayer, in * Iul. Front. fuch colours as would eafily come off: and when the hote liver of the beaft that was Strat.L.i.c.11. facrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armic as a Miracle, plainely fore-shewing that the gods would bee affishant in that Battaile.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Selencus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentic yeeres, hee died by a furfet of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was some vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no leffe valiant. By his owne proper forces Herestored his triend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grieuously molested by Acheus: who setting vp himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was belieged in his owne Citic of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectofage, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee 40 called ouer out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had loft. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themfelues, without inuitation, and found themselues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neverthelesse within awhile after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards 50 vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time follow-

restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled : leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedamonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. He was belieged in his owne Citic of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectofage, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee 40 called ouer out of Thrace, He recoursed all that he had loft. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselues, without inuitation, and found themselues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prastas King of Bubynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neverthelesse within awhile after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victoric; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards 50 vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselues within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such as had saved themfelues and their Provinces, in the flothful reigne of the Persians; or in the busic times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were veriencient. For the first of their line had married with Atosa, fister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrie was taken from them by Perdiceas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiceas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at civill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian 10 Empire; and are faid to have issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The PAphlagonians deriued themselves from Pylamenes, a King that affisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithrnia. fome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therfore having other employment, they were the leffe molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom wee haucalreadic some- 20 times mentioned.

d. VII.

The Towne of Ciostaken by PHILIP, at the instance of PRVSIAS King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred woon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

R v s 1 A s as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus, whole greatnesse he suspected. He therefore strength ned himselfe, by taking into a strict Consederacie with the Listians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Listian warre, and was denising with Antischus about sharing between them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his some Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and be- 40 flow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor just matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest hee lay at the flege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: entreating him to for fake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condifiend to their request; when he intended nothing leffe. At length hee got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadours, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, Hee omitted no part of crueltic. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Espe- 50 cially his Fact was detected of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Cian; and were aduertised by Embassadours of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howfoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as foone as he listed: yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embassadours said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noyled abroad fuch reports, as went of his fallhood and oppretions. Whilest the Embaffadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towne of Cios, and, after a cruell flaughter of the Inhabitants, bad made flaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no lesse were the Ætolians inflamed against him: fince they had fent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lylimachic and Chaltocedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could makea strong Partie in Greece. He had alreadie, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpetters of other mens vertue, having loft their owne. On the friendship of the Liolians he had cause to presume ; having bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyp-20 tians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Heceafily drew into a fireight Alliance with him 3 by their hatred newly conceived against Philip. Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readic assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had been vnscasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; fince his defire to fasten vpon Asa was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chius, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherin though Attalus was driven to runne his owne ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound : and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour 20 vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore: Yet for a smuch as He had suffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemie: and since He durst not in few dayes after pur forth to Sca, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This not withflanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether upon any hopefull desire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which he wonne Prinossus, is worthie of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth so stonie, that it resisted his worke, He neuerthelesse commanded the Pyoners to make a noyse vnder ground; 40 and secretly in the night-time Hee rayled great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the belieged, that the worke went marucilously forward. At length he sent word to the Townssimen, that by his vnder myning, two acres of their wall flood onely vpon woodden props: to which if he gave fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinasians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they faw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherfore they suffered themselves to be outfaced; and gave up the Towne as loft, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to fettle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at 50 Sca, and compelled him to make hafte backe into Macedon; whither they followed bim all the way in manner of pursuit.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, upon flight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP; moued thereto by ATTALVS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes diners Townes: and makes peremptorie answere to the Roman Embassadour. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

Hefe Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ser-

ued well to make a noyle in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient to to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly that it were expedient to to doc. A the Assumptions and knew, that informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continual dealings in Greece euer fince the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because He was original- 20 ly for sooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding vnto him, were neuerthelesse wearie of him, by reason of his personali faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially fince the divisions of the Country were fuch, that euerie pettie Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selse; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were alreadic quite exhausted, by that grieuous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Republike all their monie: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive vntill fifteene or fixteene yeeres after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of 30 paiment also which was alreadie made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to follicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by fetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemic, that sollicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant Shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed 40 no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be refifted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemics. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therfore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightic than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends : yet would he needes be secking new enemies. And he found them fuch, as he deserued to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done se him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or, in desisting from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, having broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnleffe they think them felues iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might wel be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inusolable, faue onely *by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one *$ir Fr. nacon partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that he shall bee a loser who flarts from the Conditions; it may folong (and folong onely) bee prefumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this River of Styx dried vp; and then could they Sweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selves, even by their good * Plant. Amfwords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopa. Phil. ter into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed : or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territorie, tooke state vpon them neuerthelesse, as in their ancient fortune. Two vong Gentlemen of Acarmania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous superno fiition, vainly saide to bee auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereypon they were brought before the Officers; and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to have therein done amisse; vet, as it had beene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and fought to revenge it as a publike injurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitie firred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. 30 All which at the prefent they could doe, was to fend Embassadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citic. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he understood, that the Roman Embaffadours, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the fame time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his owne followers. with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piraus, hee found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and He being no leffe glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came foorth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemne a pompe as they could deuise, to 49 meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him. in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of observance, which their flatteric could suggest. At his first comming into the Citic they called the people to Assembly: where they defired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe; saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliner in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did fo. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their fake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation 50 vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readic to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwards it would bee vaine to crane his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as Ffffff

Hee to desire it. As for other matters; they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens confifled, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus beganne a great noyfe of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Astalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vainly mil-spending the time, in seeking to draw the Atolians to their partie; that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet : Philip wanne the Townes of Maronea and Anus, with many other ftrong places about the Hellespont, 10 Likewise passing over the Hellespont, Hee layd siege vnto Abydus; and wanne it, though Hee was faine to stay there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, then any great ability to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemie. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrireme Gallie : and Attalia no more than three hundred men, farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embale fadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken fo much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Emylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolemie Epiphanes King of Ægypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Han-20 nibal and the Cartheginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that warre; and to defire the continuance thereof, if they should neede it against Philip. This Agyptian King was now in the thirdor fourth yeere of his Reigne. which (as his Father Philepator had done before him ) Hee beganne a very young boy. The courtefic for which the Romans were to thanke him, was. That out of Agypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the mileries of Warre had made all their owne Prouinces ynable to relecue them. This mefface could not but bee welcome to the Agyptian; fince it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselues against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason 20 bee hoped, that Hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Romans with Corne: fince this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leifure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the yongest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydia; which else He was like to carry. Emylius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalia and the Rhodians, upon whom Hee made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and 40 the Towns of Abydess, which Hee was now befieging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that He did onely requite them with the like. Doe you al-To (layd Emylius) requite these poore ABY DEN I with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Emylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all,) your beeing a Roman, that makes you thus prasumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee have made with mee, and to keepe it: If yee doe otherwise, I will make yee understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than 50 the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died enery one of them, and fet their Towne on fire; binding themselves herero

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them you realonable Conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meete by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilest they were busies the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger fort; that, by exhortation of their Priefts, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said he would grant the Abrdeni three dayes leifure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or 10 hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

D. IX.

The Romans decree warre against P H I L I P, and send one of their Consuls into Grecce, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederats. How poore the Athenians were at this time. both in qualitie and estate.

His calamitie of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romanes unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neverly refembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euch the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian thould winne, then refled

there no more to doc, than that he should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five moneths, but in the short space of fine dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre voon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrbus was by him alleadged; to shew, what 30 Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vadertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scepio into Africk; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By such arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleeve, that this warre with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed; and immediatly the same Consul hasted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readincife, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thankes were given to the Athenian Embaffadours, of their constancie (as was fayd) in not changing their faith at fuch time as they flood in danger of being belieged. And indeed great thankes were 40 due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts; had reason to give thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue fuggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and fince neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romanes to give them protection: these busi-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and confequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embaffadours into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemie of Egypt, and to the Ro-50 mans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuerthelesse as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doines of P. Salpicius the Conful were fuch, as might have argued Athens to bee the least part of his care. Hee sailed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie Ffffff 2

way to Macedon; and landing about the River of Apfus, betweene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embassadours were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whileft he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces Hee retained with him, for the prosequution of a greater designe. The athenians were not indeed belieged: onely some Rouers from Chaleis, in the Ile of Eubera; and fome bands of adventurers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of 10 these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to undertake the Conquests of Agypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre vponthe great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better then long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

ð. X.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubwa, taken and fackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garison at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surprise: wasteth the Countrey about : and makes a journey into Peloponne fus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedamon, and bis wife. PHILIP offers to make warre against NI A-BIs for the Acheans. He returneth home through Attica, which he Spoyleth againe : and provides against his Enemies. Some exploits 30 of the Romans. Diners Princes toyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Atolians into the warre. ,

HILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainement; or perhaps before hee had well refolued, whether it were best awhile to lit still, and trie what might bee done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inua-

ders with all his forces: Hee received advertisement from Chalcis of a grienous 40 mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne imployment better. Heegrew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to faue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemic at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hercof Claudius having advertisement, sailed thither by night for feare of being discried; and, arriving therea little before breake of day, tookeit 50 by Scalado. He vsed no mercie, but slue all that came in his way : and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse hee should have left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne desence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouisions for Warre, which were plenteously filled. Neither were Hee and his Associats contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statuas vnto him there erected. This done, they hafted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to bee joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. Hee thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trustic Friends, busie at worke in ransaking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not ynpossible to take his enemies, in the toy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-Post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him afarre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne afleepe, as feareleffe of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and 20 with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there; who feeing the many lights, and other figures of buffe preparation viuall in fuch a cafe, understood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Glaudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Towne some mercinarie Souldiers. which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to iffue forth at a gate, whereto they faw Philip make approch. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therfore 30 onely willed his men to follow his example, and prefently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue fingular proofe of his valour; and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great flaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would have allowed even to the very gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vponthe Towres ouer the gate, could not vie their calling weapons against him, without indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments belides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even vnto the 40 sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Agina; too late in regard of what was already paft: but in good time, to preuent him of fatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Acheans were denising upon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon: who being flarted up in the roome of Machanidas, did greater mischiese then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercinaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; agreedy extortioner vpon those that lived vnder him; and one that in his naturall so condition smeltrankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoyling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted Liu. lib 32, with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to bee made linely representing her; Ffffff 3 and apparrelled it with such costly garments as sheevsed to weare. But it was indeede an Engine, seruing to torment men. Hereof he made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apega flood, and there vse allhis Art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses; then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who fate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So heeled him to the Image, that role vp and opened the armes, asit were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof were also shicking in the 10 brefts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith the griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernment. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Atolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus haddone before him. By these hegrew into acquaintance with the Romanes; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former Warre. Of Philopamens vertue hee itood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercinaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this T yeart the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had fet downe, what proportion of Souldioursenery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselues with the care of this businesse; for a smuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding joy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then hee told them, That, whilest he made warre vpon Lacedamon, Hee ought not to leave his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 30 Companies into the Ile of Eubera; that so he might securely pursue the warre against 2Vabis. Immediatly they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Pretor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was affembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against 27 abis; hee brake vp the Affemblie, with enery mans good liking; whereas in former times, Hee had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paralites.

It grieued the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achaens. Neuerthelesse, he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Co- 40 rinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of ftrength, he attempted the Caftle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyraus, and even the Citic of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrushing themselves into every of these places; that hee could no more then wreak his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time lingularly beautified. So Hee destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe been masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe: but caused his men to 50 breake the very stones, that they might be unseruiceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians : to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupacins, he sent an Embassage; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Phelip occupied. Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped upon the River of Apfus. Thence he sent forth Apullius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to walte the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke fundrie Castles and Townes; vsing such extremitie of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towns which he wanne by force, that none durst afterwards makeresistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to holde our. Returning towards the Conful with his spoile, He was charged in Rete, vpon the 10 paffage of a Brooke, by Athenagor as a Macedonian Captaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The fuccesse of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet served to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the

Athamanians; and Bato, the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their affiftance ynto the Conful, who thanked them : and faid, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrie lay betweene the Atolians and

20 Thessale, might bee perhaps availeable with the Atolians, to stirre them vp against So the present care was wholy set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. This ther came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which. the Macedonian spake first : and saide, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his Master and the Atolians: fo was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. Hee prayed them to confider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the *Atoliens: and yet notwithstanding had beene angrie, that the Atolians, by making 30 peace with Philip, had no longer neede of fuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busic, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same fort had they lent their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleadged many examples, adding, That in like fort it would happen to the Etolians: who, if they drew fuch Masters into Greece, must not looke hereaster to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and 40 fend them fuch a Moderator, as went cuery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Whereforche concluded, That it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly bee reconciled : and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which stil continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who It would have troubled the Romans, to frame fought to breake it now. a good answere to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth. in the wing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were let on by them to speake next: who had

50 store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past, made war vpon the gods themselues, by desiroving all their Temples in Astica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearfall of their owne calamities; and faid, that if Philip might have his will, Atolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerua, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whole defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They fayd, that they had of late made warre in the Atolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace; whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselues, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leifure to give them aid convenient: fo this excuse being now taken away, and 10 the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the £tolians to take part with them in their warre and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might eafily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the war by more earnest motiues, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the Etolian Prator shifted them off awhile with a dilatorie answere: though hee told his Countrymen. That by referring themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answere 20 was, first, in generall termes; That ouer-much haste was an enemie to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming necrer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prator might at any time call an Assemblie of the States, and therein conclude upon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was valuately to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at fet times.

The meeting of PHILIP with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade bis dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of ATTALVS and the Roman Fleet.

M HILLE was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their follicitation of the Atelians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to dif-appoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was jud- 40 ged, as may feeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soener, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least belecue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand : it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journic Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassareti, a people in the vtmost bor- 50 ders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they joyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth

CHAP.4. S.H. of the Historie of the World. of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the Brength which he had then about him and therefore thought it better to fend fourth some of his light-armed Mercinaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was fo, that the King was vinwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no leffe vn willing to lofe too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers : and to fo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respe-Riucly, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambulh, having fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him fo hotly, that they draue him to an hastie slight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not flaying to let them runne into the danger, disconered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conful heereby gathered, that the 20 King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which hee therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armic, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front : a kind of helpe which the Romans had never vied before, but had taken thefe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about four electes ere this, that Pyrrhes carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had never seene any of those beafts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet aline, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes have none. Philip had patience to let the Conful braue him at his Trenches: wherein hee did wifely: for the Roman had 20 greater neede to fight, than Hec. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could hee without great danger, lying fo neere the Enemie, that was firong in horse, fend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: prefuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on even ground; and fo the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrie. The King was nothing forry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their prefumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careleffe, When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There he flayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages 40 that none should escape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrie, to fall voon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let nonerun home with newes to the Campe. The flaughter was great : and those which escaped the handes of them that were fent abroad to fcowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: fo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Salpicius hereupon sends foorth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselse with the Legions sollowed. The companies of Horse divi-50 ded themselues, accordingly as they met with advertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuaffing the field, tooke their taske where thev found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disduantage: ascomming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an haruest, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne fafety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselues) to escape the Enemie, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loft. The Kings horse was slaine under him: and there had hee beene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne 10 horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnesse; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blowe: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needes have retired backe to the Sea. On the other fide it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might have vonne it. But that noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his maner) hath indiciously observed, That neither the one, 20 nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not bee so assonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the desence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselse; He was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were tallen upon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custodie of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto histroublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose he sent vnto the Consul; re- 30 questing a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, hee marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemie, as if hee had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when hee heard of the Kings departure, was not flow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vie; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But 40 to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for searc. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King fent Athenagoras to vvaite vpon them home; whilest he himselfe vvent against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reserved himselfe and his Nation vnto the cuent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians 50 were fallen voon Macedon; grew no leffe busie on the sudden, than before hee had beene vvise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time : and so, not staying to proclaime warre, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invafion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; asif, without any danger, they might doe what they lifted. But Philip came voon them erethey looked for him; and killing them as they lay difperfed was like to have taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the tolians had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountaynous Countrie.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, affished by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Agean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Ile of Eubaa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were ginen to Attalus, after the fame Compact that had formerly beene made with the Atolians: the goods therein found were given to the Romans; and the people, for flaues. Other attempts on that fide were hindred; either by foule weather at Seas or by want of daring, and of meanes.

d. XII.

VILLIVS the Roman Conful wastes a veere to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VER-MINA. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. QVINTIVS FLAMINIVS is fent againft him:

Hus the time ranne away : and P. Villew, a new Conful, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiors: whereof two thousand, having ferued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home.

They were (belike) of the Legions that had ferued at Canna: as may feeme by their complaint, of having beene long absent from Italie; whither faine they would 20 hauereturned, when by their Colonelsthey were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his yeere is lost : whereof the misse is not great; since hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Linie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Linie Lini. Liga. himselfe, an Historian to whom sew of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably believe, that Villius his yeere was idle. In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could have bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Afdrubel, had beene able 40 to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremona was attempted, but faued her felfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamities Amilear a Carthaginian, that stated behind Afdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they fent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilear, who made warre in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seeme otherwise to have sauoured a little of some scare) That of the Fugitive slaves belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then To ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masanisa, as also with Verminathe sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masanisa, befides matter of complement, they were to fignific what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said. That having beene, and being still (asthey tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vied not to conferre vpon any, faue onely vpon fuch as had royally deferred it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours voon such termes as they should thinke sit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear: bani- 10 thing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had reftored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requilite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent agreat proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse : but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans bulled in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules: they laid siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile : and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should have the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the bulinesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to give congenement vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselse the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of E- 20 pirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find was into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him ) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shorely arriued at the Armie.

d. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QUINTIVS winnes a passage against Philip. Thessales wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Atolians. The Acheans for sking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to NA Bis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warreafter fuch a trifling manner. It was their vie, to give battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his different advantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (asiz would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation:

wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto pri- * Lin.L.34. nate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vie of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the flow pace where with their businesse went forward. they determined to increase their Armie, that they might have the lesse neede to relie vpontheir Confederats. So they leavied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintins Flaminius, the new Conful into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by ftraining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home ) have bred some icalousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would vidertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or elle that they would not take it 20 vncourtcously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. 30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare. T Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supplie decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had served in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Censul, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Apfus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Daffaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had al-40 ready two yeeres together mil-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountaines, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the River of Apfus, running along through that Valley which alone wasopen betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand. 50 Wherefore Quintius affailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himfelfe difappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes.

against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promifed thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That having beene, and being still (asthey tooke it) their Enemic, Heought first of all to delire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vied not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritic to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke sit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilear: bani- 10 thing him; and conficating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had reftored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requifite, give fatisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent agreat proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Malanisla would haue lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans bulied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilear and his 20 Gaules: they laid liege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilear the Carthaginian died in this battaile : and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should have the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leifure to thinke vpon the bulinesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to give congentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as alfo to affure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to ftrengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercifing and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of E- 20 pirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him ) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Conful, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Armie.

d. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QUINTIVS winnes a passage against Phillip. Thessales wastedby Phillip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Acheans for sking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. At reatie of peace, that was vaine. Phillp delivers Argosto NABIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not been ewont in former times, to make Warreafter fuch a trifling manner. It was their vie, to give battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne fo fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treafury was poore, and flood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto pri- * Lin.L. a.s. nate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driven the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vie of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the flow pace wherewith their bulinesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might have the lesse neede to relie vpontheir Confederats. So they leavied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Fla-10 minius, the new Conful into Macedon. Their Nauic, and other meanes could well have ferued, for the fetting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by fraining themselves to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home ) have bred some icaloutie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embaffadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who innaded it; or else that they would not take it 20 vnconrecously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vie the aid of their triends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeftly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embaffadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. 30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supplie decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had served in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Conful, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Apfus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Daffaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had al-40 ready two yeeres together mil-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the Warre might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Conful had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conful would have him to fet all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give libertieto those whom he had subdued of late : but vnto such, as had been long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion over them. Hee also said, That as farre foorth as it should appeare that he had done wrong vnto any Towne or people what source, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme convenient in the 10 judgement of some free State, that had not been interessed in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not fatisfied. There needed (hee fayd) no judgement or compromise; torasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one pronoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Conful was required to name those Townes, that he would have to be fet at libertie; the first that hee named were the Thessalians. These had been Subjects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, ever fince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would have layd vpon him, 20 had he been but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Conful stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselse, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heardsman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beafts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place wherethey should have advantage of the Enemie. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound : and, being promised great reward, in case he 20 made good his word, had fuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for seare of being discouered. When they had recoueted the hill-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscoursed by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gave notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilest these were on their journie, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning hee faw the smoke arise more and more plainely, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were fent: He pressed as necre as he could vnto the Enemics Campe; 40 and assailed them in their strength. Hee prevailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aftonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselnes to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to sauchimself. Yet anon confidering, that the difficulty of the paffage must needes hinder the somans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of five miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in seare, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their partie against 50 the Enemie, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Theffalians, as many of them as in his hastie retrait he

much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perfwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had goren. Some there were that forcibly resifled him; which they might the better doe, for that hee could not itay to vie any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: fo that a little hinderance did ferue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readinesse to inuade Thessale; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their seuerall Coun-10 tries. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romanes: they foreslowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintizes followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his comming, that He, in gleaning after their haruest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thef-Salians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to bee very defirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by affault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage he belieged : and having made a faire breach, vet was vnable to force it; fo floutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and 20 by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be diffrested. So the Conful, having wel-neere spent his vi-Etuals, and leeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his fiege, and departed out of Thessale. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countrie being friend to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated betweene Thessale and other Regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to have. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by asfault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in 30 effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eubaa; and afterward layd fiege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their defire to leave the part of Philip: fince it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achaans to preferre the friendship of 40 the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous warre, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poyloning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His falledealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long fince to hold him as a neceffary enil, even whileft they were vnable to bee without his affiftance. But fince by the vertue of Philopæmen, they were growne fomewhat so confident in their owne firength, fo as without the Macedonians beloe they could as well fublift, as having him to friend: then did they onely thinke how evill he was: and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers, to "Plat.invita take away the life of * Philopamen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, flin.l.2).

he did thereby onely fet fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought so with the Achaans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with-draw themfelues from the Macedonian. Cycliades, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristanus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyne them in societie with the

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should have Corinth restored to vnto them, if they would for sake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans washeld at Siegon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents defired the Acheans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way advance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in a. ny reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remem- 20 bring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly fold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into fociety: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approved 20 it ) they forbore to decree any fociety at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Miegalopolitans, Dymaans, and Argines, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue affent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argines had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Achaans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a folemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens difcouered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Parti- 40 fans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might have any small affistance. Philocles, a Lieurenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude readic to ioyne with him, Hee easily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, for they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilest as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conful would shortly bee cho- 50 sen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the fooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselse; and therefore thought it best, fince more could not be done, to prædispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay

then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Agean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian: an Embassadour of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes, and some Agents for the Etolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadus lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He resuled to come on shore: though fearing (as he faid) none but the immortal Gods: yet mildoubting some treachery in the Atolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should fetall Cities of Greece at liberty; deliner vp to the Romans and their Confederates. all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise what soeuer hee held of theirs in Illyria; and what focuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Agypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would have against the Countrie of Per Ra. lving ouer against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of divers Townes about the Hellesport, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaans defired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniustly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Atolians tooke upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Countrie, leaving it free; and withall to deli-20 uer vp vnto them, what soeuer hee held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but infolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Theffalie; corrupting (as they faid) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row neerer the shore. But they began to plie him afresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes.

pecially with one, which made the Roman Conful vnderstand, what manner of companions these Atolians were. For hee said, That he had often dealt with them; as 30 likewise the best of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a vvicked Lavy, vvhich permitted them to take spoile from spoile: yet could be get no better an answere, than Excerpt. epo. that they would sooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might bee the 196,16.17. meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by fending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He said it was strange that the Atolians should be so carefull thereof, fince divers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeede no Grecians: werefore hee would faine know, whether the Romanes would give him leave to make flaves of those Atolians, which were no 40 Greekes. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Etolians well

He answered them, (as he was much given to gybing) with fundry scoffes; and esrattled vp; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of fetting all Greece at libertic, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beseeme the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might beseeme his owne dignitie. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might he should be hereunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Acheans he charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their owne. vvherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, vvith more then humane honors. 50 Neuertheleffe he faid, that he would render Argos vnto them : but , as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe. Thus he addressed himfelfe vvholly to the Roman Generall; vnco vvhom if he could give fatisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (he said) was onely defensive; they having been the offerers: or if he gave them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Grouc, and pleafant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than fend Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus heiested the matter out : but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans, to give backe the Region of Peraa to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leifure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to adulse a- 10 bout them. For your being foill provided of Counsaile, said TITVs, you may even thanke your selfe; as baning murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleeued, that he thereby sought to abbridge the £10lians of leifure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that hee defired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would give the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Atolians, that hee would grant some part of their de-20 mands; and to the Romans, what societ they did challenge. This when Titus his affociats heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which bee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protefted, that if he could not perswade them, hee would fuffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with fincere affection harken unto good offers of peace; and immediatly conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwife, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send 30 Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courteste of the

This was cuen as Quintius would have it: who stood in doubt, less a new Conful might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily prevailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: for as it was Winter, a time vnsit for service in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolvedly either in Warre or peace. Further, he willed them to send their severall Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest hee perswaded King. Ami-40 mander, to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serve to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citic. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadours of the Greek, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; vyhich was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, 50 in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer be effected; vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossed of Corinth, Chalcia, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in sersitions.

litie: that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they desired. When therfore the Embaffadours of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middest of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Master would yeeld up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Hecreto they made answere, That, concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer harken to Philips defire of peace; wherein they faid hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truely saide, That neither the Ætolians. Acheans, nor any of their tellowes, had in the late T treatie required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes? As for corinth, whereto the Acheans had fome right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other) Philip had alreadic condescended to give it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would have been alleadged, even against the Greekes in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so hee might have had the honour to conclude the warre, it a Successor had beene decreed vnto him. But fince Hee was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor Hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to give eare vnto

20 any talke of peace. Philip, seeing that his Acheans had for saken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himfelfevnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedamonians under Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne ftrength, had been calmost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though stiling himselfe King. Yet he forely vexed the Achaans: and therefore seemed vnto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that 30 the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be casily defended, should bee configned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lace demonian, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto 2 abis his sonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the citizens themselues He might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argines: but found them so auerie; that, in open assemblie of the people, they detested the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had 40 thereby agood occasion to rob and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was readic to receive. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Armic into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argines: who for very loue had for saken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselse Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staved behinde, were commanded to bring foorth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also agreat imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to so pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were difmissed without more adoc. But if any flood long vpon the matter: or played the theeues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes; namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude; abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By fuch art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an olde custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, Hee sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse over the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauill touching Argos ) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Greee: as also hee agreed with the Achaans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, referring the finall conclusion of peace between them vntill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

The batteile at Cynoscephala, wherein PHILIP was vangui-Redby T. QVINTIVS.

ITVS QVINTIVS, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of 20 time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leffe failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwardes wholly to relie vpon

Titus had in his Armic about fixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to have met vnawares, neere vnto the Citic of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both sides discouered each other; 30 and sent word thereof vnto their seuerall Captaines. But neither of them were overhastie, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Countrie about Phera was thicke fet with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it unproper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue back vnto Scotusa in the Frontier of Macedon: where he might be plentifully served with all necessaries. Titus conceived a right his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the 40 Countrie. There lay betweene them agreat ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then fent they forth discouerers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon fent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Atolians had not beene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had beene driven backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was 50 faine to bring foorth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the descat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was alrogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own if he could vie an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: insomuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hils, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word fignifying as much, Cynoscephale. As soone as hee was on the hil-top; it did him good to fee that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage: foralmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, feruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleffe hee found convenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest; embattailing them as they might. Whileft hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrinke; as being falne vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He fets forward to helpe them : and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; having the Romans not farre behinde

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Pha-20 lanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Heere Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres; and being in like manner ysed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it felfe held together vndiifolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherfore it is no maruel, if the Romans gaue backe: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer vnto the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus 30 finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee observed. That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: fo as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or elie (which was worse) vpon defire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to 40 dispute what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeede if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they flood, made their weapons vnulefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing fixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is faid to have beene equall to the Enemic in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes: whereof hee himselse had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx having vsually sixeteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, have welso neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three foote of ground: this Lib.17. Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foote, or two hundred and forty paces;

T. QVINTIVS falleth out with the Atolians; and grantes truce water PHILIP, with conditions, upon which the peace is ratefied. Libertie proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Remans quarrell with ANTIOCH VS.

He Etolians wonderfully vanted themselues; and desired to have it noised through all Greece, That the victorie at Cynoscephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were busied in the chace. Time therefore being offended both at their vaine glory, and at their ranenous condition; purposed to reach them better maners, by regarding them as flightly, as they thought highly of themselues. He also well perceived, That by vling them with any extraordinarie favor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Atolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonisms. But

After the battaile Titus made hafte vnto Lariffa,a Citic of Theffalie: which he prefently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had fent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages what socuer in writing, betwist him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to provide for the safetic of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lariffa might well perceive, that hee gave them as alreadie loft. Wherefore wee finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the fame time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the 30 Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Etolians ever true to Philip; gaue vp themselues vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Persa, a Region of the Continent ouer against their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatic of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: for a smuch as they awaited not the good leifure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Acheans and other their friends, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Leintenant, wherein they had the victorie, and confequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to in-40 uade his Kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste, of fixe thousand foot and fine hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise Hee had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the fame time, he thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto necessitie; and therefore sent in all haste Limneus and Demolthenes, with Creliadas the banished Achaan, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadours vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in prinate, 50 with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wife dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne differetion; as Philip himfelfe in few dayes after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fifteene dayes; in which time, the King himselfemight come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane season ma-

that is, very neere a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie disionne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not every where to be found. Here at Cynoscephala Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men: the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them: being hindred from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in mastring those enemies. whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommoditie of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give backe; and the comming on 10 of the Legions, to betake themselues vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell. feeing the victoric on that part assured, left the prosequution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. Hee confidered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on fo farre; as that him felfe with his fellowes, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten about the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand; and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeed saue the first five, were accustomed, 20 when the battailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen; and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it ferued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Melopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many Fronts looking fundry waves, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be evnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loofe order, that fo with eafe they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Like wife it is to be considered, That Alex- 20 anders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnleffe their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resiflance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselues, threw downetheir weapons, and fled. The King him selfe had thought vnrill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyle behind him, and turning a little alide with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neither staid hee afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Temps, 40 thereto collect fuch as were dispersed in this overthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and fine thousand taken Prisoners.

nie suspitious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Atolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honeitie, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men elle. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had fent letters vnto his Affociates; willing them to have their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie should be held. There when they were all affembled, they entred into confultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every Estate in particular. The poore King Aminander befought them all, and especially the Romans, that 10 they would think vpon him; and confidering his weaknes which he confessed, make fuch prouision, that after the Romanes had turned their backs, and were gone home. Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to relift. Then foake Alexander one of the Etolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus affembled the Confederates to adulfe vpon their ownegood, and had willed them to deliver their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, hee was vtterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their libertie. There was, he faid, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by 20 Titus himselfe vnto the Greeks, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titue answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rame, or with the laudable cuftomes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any King or Nation at fuch time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And heereof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was one! van inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece: it was (he faid) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weake- 20 ned and brought low; not that it should be vtterly destroyed for a much as it ferued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other fauage Nations, which would soone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought other wise, it should bee at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Aetolians, to fay, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no leffe than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babling; 40 faying. That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so desirous, should thence foorth not have it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further to fland to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phane.us the Atolian, infulting over him, faid it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length give vp to the Atolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answere was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoling himselfe, said it should be otherwise; 50 These were Thessalan Townes, and should all bee free: one of them onely excepted. which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now bee given to the Atolians. Heerest Phaneas cried out that it was too great an injurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had fometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titiss to confider that by an arcient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to have nothing faue the pillage and captines. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Atolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vinderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable. that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition should be deliuered into subjection of the Atolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angry passages betweene the Roman and the Atolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so carnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to give them libertie, though they had flood out against him, even till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they cpposed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly vnto a Truce for source

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

The chiefe cause that mooned Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleaded; was, the same of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be pro-20 tracted. And hee was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadours from the Macedonian, and fundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Confuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly againft the peace; alleadging friuolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected. between the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to what some was demanded, and the letters of Trus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Conful on the other; who faid, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the 30 Tribunes, that referred it to an Assemblie of the People; by whose soucreigne authoritie it was concluded. That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embaffadors were fent from Rome ouer into Greece; in which number were they, that had beene Confuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered vnto the Acheens; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto

50 Foure hundred talents hee had alreadic delivered vnto Titus, together with his yonger fonne Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as hee lately sent his Embassadours to Rome: when it was promiled, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as Hhhhhh part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde : and it seemeth otherwise, for asmuch as yong Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was given for hostage, remained still in custodic of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusies King of Bithynia: giving him to understand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertic, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materiall; fince the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they 10 had not leifure to examine the conformitie of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargaine which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Etolians found themselves agricued that they were veterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Bactians continued to fauour the Macedonian, and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them wel-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; faying, that they were no better than loft, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refuled to have an hand in the execution, yet 20 neuertheleffedid animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoener they durst not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Beotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred fouldiers, which he had loft by them, to have paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In flead of making any fuch amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not 20 take as good fatisfaction. Hee fends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he fals to wasting their Countrie; and beliegeth two fuch Townes of theirs, as did feeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Acheans and Athenians, (especially of the schaans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet befought him rather to grant peace vnto the Beotians) prevailed fo farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of fuch as were knowne offendors.

In like fort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted : some 40 among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolians would haue beene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places. wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceine, that this Macedonian Warre ferued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Alia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to flay the progresse of bad rumors when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace vvere never without great folemnitic and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, cau- 50 fed proclamation to be made by found of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubæans, Eubwans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Theffalians, and Perrhebians. The Juddenness of this Proclamation aftonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durit scarce credit their owne cares. The Greeks were Crafts-mafters in the Art of giving thanks; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had welneere fmothered him, by thronging officioully about him.

CHAP.4. S.15. of the Historie of the World.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more availeable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antio hus, than could have beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Provinces which were named in their Proclamati-10 on. Vpon confidence hecreof, no fooner were these Islamian games at an end.than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagelianax and Lyfigs King Antiochus his Embassadours : whom they willed to signific vnto their Lord. That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore what socuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadours. that he should not passe over his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes: to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they 20 gaue ynto the Atolians; whom they thought it no wisedome to offend ouer-much. being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians; all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Atolians in the last Treatie with Philips The Atolians contended very carnefly about Phar falus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatorie answere, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how socuer somewhat the Councell might favour them; yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth. Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the 30 Achean Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip; and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would have given the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubæa, to his sonne and successionr King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that there as well as the rest of the Eubwans, should be suffered to enjoy their libertie. Oresis, a little Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, 40 bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romans long ere this, and fince continued true to them; for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These businesses being dispatcht: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædispose them vnto the affisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS the great, and his adherents.

What Kings, of the races of SELEVCVS and PTOLEMIE, raigned in Alia and Agypt before Antiochus the great.

Polyb.lib.2.

ELEVO VS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee was trecherously flaine by Ptolemie Ceraumus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is faide) beene warned before by an Ora-20 cle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath beene preserued, or any mischance avoided, by the predictions of such Deuilish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochis Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who furrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderflood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ce- 20 rannus had great cause to feare, that the death of Selencus would not bee vnreuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Cerauniss enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleueus. It is faid of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modeslie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous lone was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not profecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature should have viged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alfo Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were fet vpon him by 40 the same Nicomedes. With these he sought a great battaile : wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphia: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soone gaueit ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berofus the Genebrard.lib.: Chaldean dedicated his Historic of the Kings of Affyria; the same, which hath since beene excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiockus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentic and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth 50 yeere of the Kingdome of the Greekes; when he had raigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title given vnto him, by flatteric of the Milesians; whom hee delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie CHAP.5. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

Philadelphus King of Ægypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters have vnderstood that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the Danestines South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which fol-

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (fetting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoeuer, the worthiest of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, Hee sent unto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the lewes, had formerly bin very great: for He had fet at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slauerie throughout all Agypt; and hee had fent vnto the *Temple of God in Hierusalem * Aug. de Ciu. very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuentie two of the most graue and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the feuentietwo Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventie; lefus the sonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to have beene 20 one: who that he lived in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently prooved by Jan-Jenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole of flage of this businesse between Philadelphus and the High Prieft, was written (as h 10/cpius affirmes) by Ariff. aus that h 10/an.l.12.c.2 was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolemie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the Concerning that Booke time wherein hee iountly reigned with his Father. Hee was exceedingly beloned which now of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his goes under the name of th end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had beene in his former yeeres: in which riflam; many time he boasted, that hee alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this learned men, had beene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue flood with reason: o- and among the reft Lodonicus therwise, the Gowt, with which hee was often troubled, was enough to teach him vines, hold suf-30 his owne errour. He was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, pition that it is that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among counteries, those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp. Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his second marriage, hee vied his first were to befufwife with no better regard, than if shee had beene his Concubine. Laodice hated petted in the him for this: yet aduentured not to seekerenenge; vntill her own some Seleneus Cality may be now linicus was of abilitie to bee King. This was two or three yeeres after the death much more of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time shee poysoned her husband Theos; and by inflysuspected fine anew permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that she Edition of its 40 had borne to Antioches. Justine reports, that Berenice faued herselfe, together with the comeloorth, yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuarie at Daphne; and that not only fome faults (as the Cities of Afia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Euergetes, King of Papilisterme Agypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was slaine be. wherein they

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fif. what they leafe, and teene yeeres beene King, beganne his Reigne. His subjects were highly offended at let foorthby his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was Middendorpius like, that his Estate would have beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who at Colen. An. came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some Iust. 27. 50 Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owneKing: but rather they fided with the Agyptian; who tooke Landice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as shee had well descrued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invalion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Agret; went about a dan-Hhhhhhh 3

gerous piece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had beene much better, by well deferuing, to have changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared in furnithing and manning whereof hee was at fuch charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. Heerein hee embarqued himselfe; and, putting to Sca, met with such a tempest, as denoured all saue himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neuerthelesse to his great good; as anon after it feemed. For when his Subjects understood, in what fort the Gods (as they conceived it ) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, 10 presuming that hee would thencefoorth become a new man, offered him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuined him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Agyptian, he made ready a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemie would soone beeat his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochius was then but fourteene yeeres olde, yet ex- 20 tremely ambitious; and therefore glad of fuch an occasion to make himselfe great. He levied a mighty Armie of the Gaules; where with he let forwards to helpe his brother; or rather to get what hee could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised; and having no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to have the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saued himselfe, with so few about him, that he was verily suppofed to have perisht in the battaile. Thus did Gods justice take revenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might have beene 30 thought) on the head of this bloudic King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothere death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and denised how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laide hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransome himselfe with money, asif hee had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but 40 made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. . Eumenes hearing of this, thought the scason fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great maruaile; since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaules his owne fouldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which furname was given him, because he sought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether hee were prouoked 50 or not) foared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gau'es. Having fetcht agreat compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This hee soone perceived: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe a though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length heerefolued to bestowe himselfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what enil hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can find no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee laydhim vp in close prison: whence, though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murdered. Neareabout the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against 10 him, during his warres with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his cuill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered to closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Ar laces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappie reigne of twenty yeeres. Hee had to wife Laodice, the fifter of Andromachis, one of his most trustic Captaines: which was father vnto that Achaes, who making his advantage of this affinitic, became shortly after (as he stilled himselfe) a king: though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Landice hee had two fonnes; Seleucus the third, furnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, 20 called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through lickneffe, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally he was staine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. Hisdeath was reuenged by Acheus, who flue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armic: which he ruled very wifely, and faithfully awhile; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Childe.

NTIOCHVS was fearcely fifteene yeeres olde, when hee began his reigne, which lasted fixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful feruants.

This vilde qualitie in a Counsailour of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will fhortly discouer.

Sooneafter the beginning of Antioches his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elf-50 where beene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieued Aratus and the Acheans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. Hee annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies ; and the last good King of the race.

CHAP.5. $.2.

The name of Energetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Agyptians not fo much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recourred some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyles, when hee conquered Egypt, 'had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made war vpon the lewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere couetousnesse of mony, refufed to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twenty talents: but hee was pacified by the wisedome of losephus a Iew, vnto whom afterwards he let in farmethe Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which hee held. For Calofyria, with Palastina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay necessity unto Leypt, were held by the Agyptian; either as having fallen to the share of Ptole- 10 mie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipfus; or as being won by this Energetes, in the troublesome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicas. The victories of this Energetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucide: were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded be S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fix and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we find in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there faith, that he came into Agypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may there- 20 fore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtie yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsailer, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Aevotian; for the recovery of Calofyria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was verie vnseasonably given; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrie. Neuerthelesse Hermids, being more froward than wise, maintained stifly, that 30 it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithful; whileft He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselse, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therfore sent Xenatas an Achean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilest in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Calosyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Desarts into the Vallie of Marsyas, betweene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that ferued vnder Ptolemie. So hee confumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenetas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his 40 whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto

Xenatas, whilest he was yet on his journey, and drew neere to the River of Tyeris; received many advertisements, by such as fledde over vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether falle; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessitie. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if hee had prepared to passe the River by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, 50 in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and fent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so bee stopped, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne fouldiours: or whether thereby to deceive his Enemic; the greatfolly of Kenatas made his stratageme prosperous. For Xenatas, having borne himselfe proudly before, voon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was advanced vnto this charge; did now prefume, that all should give way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vling the fword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forfaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them so doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vo themselues against the journey, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting 10 the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other fide of Tygris. But Malo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: hee made such haste backe vnto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whileft they were yet heavie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So Xee nætas and a very few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe; the rest were flaughtered, without making relifiance; and many of them, ere they were perfeetly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to faue their owne lives. In the heat of this victorie. the Rebell marched vnto Selencis, which he presently tooke: and, maste-20 ring within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted vnto Susa; whereat his first comming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Caffle that was exceeding firong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this bufinesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marly as; filled him with great forrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counfaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre hee had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Calolyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counfaile was put in execution with all convenient hafte. Yet was Epigenes dismissed

30 by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not ondure to heare good counfaile given, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journey against Malo, the name and presence of the King was more amailable, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other confideration, would ferue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience ; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him, to affaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discouered by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some errour, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly 40 quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in gining

battaile to Molo, your confidence which hee had that many would revolt ynto him. Neither was he deceived in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Enfignes; but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soone as euer they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to doe him sernice against Molo. This was enough to have wonne the Victorie: but Molo shortned the worke, by killing himselfe; as did also divers of his friends, who for scare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne fwords.

After this Victorie came joyfull newes, that the Queene Landice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married vnto Intiochus awhile before, had 50 brought foortha fonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vie hee could, of her friendly disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, Hee judged it convenient to visit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counfailer Hermins gaue affent : not fo much respecting the Kings honour;

as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe, For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernment. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians, having the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betweene the Cashian and the Euxine Sca. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therfore yeelded vnto whatfoeuer Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, fuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias sinforming him truely, how odious hee was vnto the people; and how 10 dangerous he would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleeued this, having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a fleight a good way out of the Campe. and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have vsed fo much Art, in ridding his hands of a man fo much detelled. For how focuer hee feemed gracious whilest hee was aline: yet they that for feare had been most obsequious to him, whilest hee was in case to doe them burt, were as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had descrued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wives 20 and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, thelonger that it had been concealed.

About these times, Acheus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which hee tooke in hand; was bold to fet a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue inuaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and fludie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Acheus; nor yet diffembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with 30 fuch infidelitic, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes he emboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to mointaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Calosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong Citie neere vnto the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Intigonus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, 40 haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodorus the Atolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and desended Carlospria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forrie, that he had vsed so much faith and diligence, in sernice of an unthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to have regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to findegreater, by applying himselfevnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthic of these two Kings; He offered to deliver up vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest 50 he was deuising about this treason, and had already fent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he belieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Egyptian Kingsthat was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a journey into Egypt it (elfe. Agathocles and Sosibius boreall the fway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hashily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the warre: and neverthelesse, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, 10 as likewise from the Esolians; according to the viuall courteste of the Greekes, desiring to take up the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by agathocks and Sofibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus, But whilest this Treatic lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandris for the warre: wherein these two Counsailours perswaded themselues reasonably, that the victory would bee their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouernours of Agypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the dispolition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, comming from 20 Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceived, by the cunning of Agashocles and his fellow. Antiochus therefore having wearied himfelfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne : and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promife that he would be ready to hearken unto equall Conditions, when they should bee offered. It was not his meaning to bee fo courteous, as he would faine have seemed, but onely to lull his enemies afleepe, whilest he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Acheus to some good order, whose treason dayly grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Aegyptian would have vsed, Hee 30 vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeare better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeelde vnto him, fince Ptolemie provided not for their desence. Neuerthelesse, he gave audience to the Embassadours, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Aegypt: pleafing himselfe well, to dispute about the instice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were instorno. He said, that it was agreed betweene Selencus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Selencus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall confent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such 40 bargaine. They faid, that Piolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Caelosyria, and the Provinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes haue Achaus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seeke to to ioyne him in Confederacie with his owne Souereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation hee was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armic, was comming vp against him out of Agypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him

Acham was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Azyptian have taken the paines. of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, it fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carryed beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as hath 40 beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her fifter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maieflie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Agypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrei betweene his sonnes-in-law, had no reafonto take part against the more honourable. As for the Agyptian: Hee was not 50 onely flothfull; but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of £gypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour

Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: fince they leffe effeemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercinarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subjection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent, as hee thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Acheus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Agyptian, than hee turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achaus. To this purpose he entred into 10 League with Attalus; that so hee might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within awhile he had pent up Acheus into the Citic of Sardes; where he held him about two veeres belieged. The Citic was very strong, and well victualled: fo as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Cassle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner ima pregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Cassle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner fituated vpon steepe Rocks, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkafes of Horses, and 20 other beafts, yea, and sometimes of men, yeed to be throwne. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the walls; where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as beeing thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approoued his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of fuch men, as hee defired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceined: and, though with much labour, yet without refistance, he scaled those Rockes, and 30 (whilest a general affault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was at other times vngarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Crafus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Acheus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiechus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; having none other hope to prevaile, than by familhing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall tediousnesse of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Parthi-49 ans with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But hee thought it not safe, to let Achaus breake loose againe. On the other fide there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Agyptian, and good friends vnto Achaus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliver this befieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries vnder Taurus, he would soone have an Armie at commaund, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrie, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle 50 of Sardes flood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Acheus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He undertooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing

tiators Achaus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in privile characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none faue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew. that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the mossenger; he was a trustic fellow, and one whom Achaus found, by examination. heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epiftle, which were, That hee should bee confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the commaund of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Neuertheleffe other way to escape hee saw none, than by putting himselfe 10 to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achaus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, faue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen, *Among these * some sew excepted, have beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a confultation together, that was, as & Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the lafetic of him whose deliuerance they vndertooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and dan-Cretan: who in ger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally Thare betweene them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and 20 then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliner Achaus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monic, and with premise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should Countrey, with be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than all the good & were the friends of Achaus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At whomhe could length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and conneigh Acheus thence: Hee first went with was to get vp into the Came, and conname, twice firmed vnto him by word of mouth the affurance of his liberall promifes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faith- 30 Puritan, & one full vnto Ptolemie whom he had long served; He accompanied Arianus vp into the that have been Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at dangerous vn- large by Acheus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But he discoursed raigne. It is an fo well, and with such grauitie; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either honour to bee his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldiour, had long been a Captaine under ill poken of by for dilineata Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was innited by honoufodiligeara Ptolemie, and did not thruit miniment into consonned, of winning (as it feemed) fupporter of rable and faithfull men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countriman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and there-Lies: in regard by had already fundry times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But awhereof I may gainst all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred 40 the commen. vp some diffidence. Acheus therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet dation of Cre- stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or ticifine no lefte fourc of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerthan be in mul- ning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby he tooke order, not to commit himselse wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to fay, That hee had to doe with one, whose knauery could not der times, that be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Achaus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be ap. 50 pointed to leade the way, as one that of late had troden it oft; and Eolis following behinde, should have an eye vpon Acheus, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that beeing taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Prefent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide: the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achaus made none acquainted with his purpole, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified hee the matter to his wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to have knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as neede should require, for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deutling upon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (faith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achaus, or whether Achaus himselfe were there. The way was very vneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in divers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon enery occasion, they were all of them very officious toward Acheus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that hee was the man: and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in waite; Bolis whiftled, and presently clasped Achaus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to 20 Antiochus: who sate vp watching in his Pauilion, expecting the euent. The sight of Acheus, brought in bound vnto him, did so assonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes affembling his friends together, Hee condemned Acheus to a cruell death: which argues, that hee was not mooued with pittie towards this vnhappie man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes. that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed 30 well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, A un traydor dos alleussos. The death of Acheus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after awhile they gaue up the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings and commonly subject vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus : vnder whose po-40 fleritie they continued until the Reigne of Seleucus Callinious, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The luftfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquilhed and thought to bee flaine by the Gaules; did flirre up Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to feeke reuenge of injuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he flue the Kings Licutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that diffurbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed, Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King; and by good government of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subjects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; solike as that of the Ptolemies in Agypt, and that of the Cafars afterwards in Rome.

Much about the same time the Bachrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Armie, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and paffages of Mountaines. The relistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted. as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him. in Woods and Streights betweene their Mountaines; it being case to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might either get aboue the Enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did he often imploy against them his light armature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and give way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durft not adventure themselues in open ground. Arsaces, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia; who though hee was confident in the fideli- 10 tie of his owne subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Defarts, would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Echatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out; He caused the Wels and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoyled. By which meanes, and theresistance before spoken of, when he could no preuaile, Hee withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrie: wherein, without some victory obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly prouided for the warre. Whereforehee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then 20 forward into Hyreania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Arsaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his delires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arsaes craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors : but having gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Enthy- 20 demus he fought a battaile by the River Arius, where he had the victory. But the vistoric was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonic which he gaue of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was flaine vinder him; and he himselse received a wound in his mouth, whereby hee loft some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe into the further parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, feeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was vniuftly vsurped from him: Euthy demus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurpers: and further, 40 That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, faue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Scothians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemns, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassadour in this Treatie of Peace, was not a little anaileable vnto a good Conclusion: For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage one of his owne daughters: and there withall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome; caufing him neuerthelesse to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to binde himselse by 50 oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, madea jonrney ouer Caucalus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagalenus, King of the Indians, the societie that had been betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayled part of his forces out of their Countric. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-bufied in a great civill Warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vo his Countrimento Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title he soone changed, though nor without some contention, into the Name and Maiettie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselse, (hauing an Armic of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, 10 ere Seleucus Nicator could find leifure to call him to account. Neither did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as readic to defend his owne; fo strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking only a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fittie : as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which hee left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any buli-20 nesse worthie of remembrance with the Westerne Countries. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to have retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Cafar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, fent Embassadours with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, Hee saide, That He had command ouer fixe hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diners Ages, even vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peraduenture of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagasenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiving Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with fuch reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hi-30 ther side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatneffe within few yeeres enfuing, by prefuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in sceming.

His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile, and studie which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leaving his sonne Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemic surnamed Philopator, that is to fay, alouer of bis Father, is thought to have had that furname given him in meere derifion; as having made away both his Father and Mo- Iuflind 30. ther. may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death; yet the beattlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to have done any mischiefe, whereof he could be accused. Having wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gave himselfe over to sensuality; & was wholy governed by a Strumpet called agatheelea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and fifter; which had adventured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him undertaken and performed with honor. The Lieutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatfocuer: were wholly referred vnto the difoolition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and of Ocuanthe a filthie Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to to the great griefe of all the Countrie, till Philopator died: who having reigned feuenteene yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of fine yeeres old, begotten on Arlinoe that was his fifter and wife. After the Kings death: Agathocles beganne to take upon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not bee accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselues) and bringing foorth vnto them his sister Agathoclea, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his fifter, but ynto the 20 faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole flate of the Kingdome did now relie. He befought them therefore that they would bee faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse. that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterseiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but flood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly hee was hated. And so brake vp the 20 Affembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathoeles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly beene his manner, by ving his authoritie, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. Hee haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors. and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceived extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the prefentinjurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also mooued with seare of 40 harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citic. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armic. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motimes wrought with the people: so by the remedie which Agathoeles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vato vprore. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore fouldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought foorth, and 50 all things cuen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the Minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the dores open. Hee perceining this, naked as he was , conneighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom hee found fome in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turkes lanizars. Being affured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus been vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would fee the King, and not leave him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no leffe adoc than the Souldrours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, 10 by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliucred up to the furie of the people. Agathecles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His fifter was dragged naked up and downe the firectes; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

CHAP.5. S.2.

These troubles in Agypt, served well to stirre vp King Amiochus; who had very good leifure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same delire, to get what part he could of the childes 20 estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Agyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings: who though they fecretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to divide betweene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was very soone found bulled, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Atolian, being a Pensioner to the Agyptian, was fent into Greece to rayle an Armie of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Agypt, I doe not find: and 20 therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadours, o in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene o Lindib.31.

shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went up into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Jewes; who feeme to have yeelded themselves a little before vnto antiochis, at such time as they faw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiving helpe from Egypt. But Vid.10seph.aut. it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next Ind. (12.6.3) yeere following, which was (according to Eufebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephala; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recoucred all that had beene loft. Among the reft, the Iewes with great willing neffe returned vn-

49 derhis obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated. The Land of Egypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrie would willingly submit it selfe voto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held over-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promifed to affoord him great advantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other fide, the state of Egypt being such as hath beene deso clared, seemed easie to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Spria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hithertothey had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Leypt alone, He was about to make invalion your Atalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embas-

fadours, and delitted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans: He fends Embaffadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitte betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadours were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answere of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answere of the Romans was not fincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights 10 with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Towneselsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie, yet withall hee fends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the diffractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irrefolution, How not with standing his attempts you both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable defire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling for unes. How-Soeuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: 20 willing them there to flay for him; whileft he himfelfe with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other veffels, intended to passe along by the Coass of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Agyptian. It was a notable Ast of the Rhodians, that, whilest the war of Philip lay yet you their hands, they aduentured voon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: wherby they gave him to understand. That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not joyne with Philip their enemie. and helpe him against the Romans. It was infolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King; yet he tempered himselfe, and 20 without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answere; partly himselfe to their Embaffadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embaffadours which he thither fent. He hewed his defire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, left his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainement and answer by them newly given to his Embassadours.

The Rhodians appeare to have been a cunning people, and fuch as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what 40 had passed betweene his Embassadours and the Senate, mooued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not bee conrented to fit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to bee at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could vnto all the subjects of the Aegyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the fonne of Attalus, prognoficate as concerning the warre that followed, between An- 50 ziochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetern, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, rhat the Romans would furely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstayning from this affinitie, it should be in his power to joyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendthip. Contrariwife, if hee leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his ouerthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie. Antiochus himselse wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrns and Lamp (acus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately strone to maintaineir, in hopethat the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring hee failed vnto the 10 Hellespont: where having won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, hee paffed ouer into Europe fide; and in short space mastered the Chersonelus. Thence went hee to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Atolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that hee had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hereunto Philip made answere, that his Garrison did not oppresse the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and fackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answere was good and substanciall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming 20 thither. For the Towne was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into slauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified : as also to redceme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewise hee was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians; he tooke a iournie in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leauing the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient lituation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it 30 highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Selenew Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition hee shall dearely pay : and as after that victoric against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall adeadlie wound of

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of war with antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their was with answering, whereor notice was alreadic taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepethernmour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrel!; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, fince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did thereafterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdome of Pergamu: also verie shortly after he sent Embassadours to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whileft as yet they were busied with Philip; and therfore had reason to answere his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Cli- 10 ents vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worle, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with histen Counsailors sent from Rome, requited (as hath beene * shewed before) with a commination of warre, this kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; fince, in regard of Antiochus, hee was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through diners quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them 20 should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vinnindfull of the busines: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget anything to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embassage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having beene fent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counfailours) from Bargilla, to be prefent at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were 30 also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptoric Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliucred his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also give vp the Townes of late belonging vuto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could bee more abfurd, than fuch folly in the 40 Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason hee was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his journie there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans. To this the King made answere, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositic, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what busines had drawne him thither; namely, the warre a- 50 gainst the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recourse of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Cherfone fus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or £gyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to fland in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vponone of his fonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be gricued with his proceedings in Alia: either against the tree Cities, or against the King of Agypt: since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himfelte, and to joyne ere long 10 with Ptolemie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadours of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could fay for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in began a tale; wherein they feemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent ludges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them holde their peace; for a fmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laide their complaints in such fort, as they might be a conucni-20 ent foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart wel fatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend only the goodnesse of their swordes; nor yet ouer-modeltly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iuftice, forbeare the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these redions ghests; that would take none answere, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were defirous to haflen into Agypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Corner 30 lius, to preuent him thereof, and fet the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was fent from Rome Embaffadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his sellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together; and the King foorthwith made readie, to be in Agypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus hee committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-fee the building of Lysmachia; but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and failed vnto Ephefus. Thence hee fent Embaffadours to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such fort, as might fland with honestic and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him 40 beare another way from Agypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have fafely recouered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered : fecure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatic at Lysimachia, (at leastwife not long before or after it) one of their Limbassadours that had beene fent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Notto rest contented with the Peace which was granted vinto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the 50 Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited fome fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainely, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were follicited; and particularly the Atolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answere made by the Atolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promifed vnto them: vpbrayding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victorie ouer Philip; but even for helping them to fet foot in Greece, which elfe they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answeres: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to fend Embassadors to the Senate, and ytter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter vnto the enemies of Hanmibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. Hee had of late exercifed his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the fway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject vnto them, the lines. goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that whose offended any one of them. should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to 20 be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Civie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that yeere : yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vnto fuch an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accomptable to them. if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore fending for one of the Ouxflors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him; the prove Quefor fet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverte Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to bee chosen into the Order of Judges; in contemplation whereof, hee was filled alreadic with the spirit of his future Greatnesse. But he had not to doe with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occu- 20 pied the place before. Hannibal fent for him by a Pursiuant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique affemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vidutiful stubbornicise of this Quzfor had beene; but how vnfufferable the infolencie of all the Judges at the prefent was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He foorthwith propounded a Law, which paffed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene passed, before he passed ouer Iberus : it would not perhaps have beene in the power of Hanno, 40 to have brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray eyther that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal confidering this, beganne to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes what soeuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie; but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vie, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. -Hereof 50 he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to reftore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie; and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew northe valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him , beganne to rage excremely; as being by him thript of their idgotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they fent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Oneftionleffe, if oppreffing the Citic by iniuffice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Burchines 10 might well crie out, That having done their best alreadic to keepe all in quiet they faw none other likelihood than of Warre. But having none other matter to alleadee, than their owne innentions: they faid. That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beatt, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carebage; with what elfe to like effect they could imagine. The leaccusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, cuery one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the fortherance of their 20 malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusfers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreffe, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time prevailed, nor vsed their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained is. But the Romans were not all fo great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadours they lent ouer to Carthage, C. Serulius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus. whole very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their commung; 30 and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gave out, That they were fent to end some controuerlies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masanista. But Hannibal had kept fuch good espiall upon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer unprepared. It were enough to fay, That hee escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so samous a man, I hold it not importinent to rehearfe the particularities. Having openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, Hee went foorth of the Towne when it beganne to wexe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though fuch as he might well trust. Hee had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Towre 40 of his owne by the Sca-fide. There had been Ship furnished with all things needfull: as having long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So He hade Atrick farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Pagfing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; he found there in the Hauen some Merchants ships of Carthage. They faluted him respectively: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither hee was bound. He find, Hee went Embaffadour to Tire: and that he intended there in the lland to make a facrifice; whereto Hee innited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their failes and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. 50 They did fo; and feasted with him till it was late at night; at which time hee left them there asseep; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was fore not to bee purfued. For the Merchants did neither make hafte to fend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cereina; being bussed awhile in sitting their tackle. At Carthage, the missed of so great a person was diversly construed. Some ghessed aright, That he was sled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had been seene: and then the Roman Embassadours, having none other errand thinter, accused him (with an evill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and cauling men to understand, that Hee sled not thus without great reason.

Hamibal, comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citic of Carthage, was there entertained 10 Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinitie between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephelus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to bee therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselues, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not prooue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make flour Souldiours of base Assatiques; as it had been by his trayning and disci- 20 pline, to make very scruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Natious, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall confiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thoufand other fuch vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein hee had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victo- 30 rie: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to anoid the warre; then should it surther serue, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes; vnleffe by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, defirous of innouation, and therefore practifing with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailours, That the 40 Senate would grant them what focuer with reason they should aske. But this promile was too large, and vnaduifed. For when their Embaffadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselues: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The dayly talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrey. For the Leolians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had layd heavier setters upon them, than formerly 50 they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious as of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no de-laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and withinit felfe. As for Antiochus; He made it his dayly fuit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more affurance. Neuertheleffe T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochu meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Aerocoriathus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withit and the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quin-10 tius were the reports of the tenne Embassadours, that had been sent oner to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they faid, would quettionlesse fall upon Greece: wherein he should finde not onely the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, readicto giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farreaway in Syria, and not intentine to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprite in hand; 20 P. Cornelius Scipio the African defired, and obtained, a second Consulfhip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hamibal. For the prefent, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be forry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is alreadic showed, whilest hee had Warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans fake to bee at peace with the Acheans; neither fince that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw 20 vpon himselse this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Acheans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee caused to meete for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearfed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be carnest. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabu, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in fome fort maimed, or incompleat, 40 whilest the noble Citie of Arges was lett in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to confider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leave it as it was: This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselues. The Athenian Embassadour made answere hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could deuise. He gaue thankes to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the so vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue and high deferts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulnes rather would have required an acknowledgement, of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Liolians. Wherefore Alexanger the Atolian role vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recoucrie of the libertie generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallen, that they became Paralites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into seruitude. Then spake Hee against the Acheans, Clients that had been a long time vnto the Macedonian; and fouldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, Hee said, had gotten Corinth, and must now have warre be made 10 for their fakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Atolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes been friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did hee thus containe himselfe, but obiected unto the Romans traudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chaleis, and the Acrocorinth; having been alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could never bee at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to finde themfelues occupied, that fo they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrie? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie 20 their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed beefree, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Aetolians themselues did promise, and would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought fo much with these Actolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themsclues, that worse would vie it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well diffemble this; making it no small part of their grieuance, 30 That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been couenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leauethe Townes and Lands in possesfion of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand milchiefes by them done in former times, made the whole Affembly, especially the Acheans, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take fuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Atolian thecues be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quier. All this was highly to the pleafure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Atolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadours did presently after lie hard vpon him, to drawe the peace to some 40 good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight anfwere: telling them, That the ten Émbassadors or Counsailours which had beene fent vnto him from Rome, to be his affiftants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon

Now concerning the Lacedemonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the service: as also Philip of Mecedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether 50 it were to get sauour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him invitie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Acheans, who set out ten thousand Foote, and a thousand Horse. As sor the Etolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their disponance.

fitions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themfelues as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achains now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Atolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselues hereatter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

CHAP.5. S.4. of the Historic of the World.

Some of the Argines more bold then wife, began a conspiracie against the Lacedemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman.
But ere Titus diew neare, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a very tew, that escaped out of the Towne. The same of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet.
But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the bead of his strength at Lacedemon, than to consume time about o ther places; especially at Argos: for the freedom wherof since the Warre was made, pitte it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most beauily.

Naki had in readinesse an Armie of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Fine thousand of them were Mercinaties: the rest. of his owne Countrie; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the 20 good and worthy Citizens hee flood in doubt, and fince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Affemblie: and compaffing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within them elues; they might, he faid, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulentheads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should be keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not onely the Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which 30 else they might have incurred. Hereupon heecites and apprehends about sourescore of them; whom hee leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breakcloofe. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selse vnto some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streetes, and slaine. Having thus affrighted the Citizens; He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. Hee welcommed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly hap-40 pens, the Souldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, layd siege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritic: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, flue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius 50 with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and awaite what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Arges, whereof he had the Government with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argines: it beging (as may feeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gyttheum: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke upon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was fent his Embassador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: proouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the fumme was, That what societ they now did, or could object vito him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That nei- 10 ther for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; fince Argos, and all other their allegations what soever, had not hindered them, in time of their more neede of him from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, for a funch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that fome other cause of this Inuasion should be alleadged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: 20 That he had bargained to joyne with Philip; when he was their enemic, not onely in League, but also in affinitie: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, fince in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may feeme to have beene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very friuolous. As for Mesfene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to have beene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prætor of the 30 Achains, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting left the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne inflice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was ver their Confederate; and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to confider well of his owne effate; and to fettle his fortunes, whileshe might doe it without hazzard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to furrender their Estates, and lived in great securitie, honour, and happines, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to de- 40 liuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counfaile with his friends. The iffue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon fuch Conditions as Tilue should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very gricuous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedemonian to have ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor war, either in that Hand or elf-where; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other 50 shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be payd out of hand, and fiftie talents yearely, for eight yeares next enfuing. For observance of these Couenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be

CHAP.5. S.4. of the Historie of the World. the Tyrants owne fonne: If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon instice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, haue beene profecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them; to cmich themselues by the spoile to of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Atoleans. and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to bee Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious discourse. For fince Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not bee suffered by these Matterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedamon, once the most famous Citic among all the Greekes, was by the fame Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yellerday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritic, as their friend and Confederate. 2 Nabis on the other fide thought himselte vn-20 mercifully dealt withall, by the felfe-fame Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the love and affinitie of the Macedonian King. that had committed the Citie of Argosinto his hands. But fally had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fallly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; saue onely that for the banished Lacedamonians, (of whom a great number werein the Roman Campe; having among them Agesipolis the naturall King of Sporta, that being a yong childe was driven out by Lyourgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely Icaue required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad 30 with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to give consent voto the'e demands: and fustained an affault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would foone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding voto all that had beene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himselfe; and was readic upon the first aduantage, to doe them all mischiese that he could.

The Argines had heard newes that Lacedemon was even at point of being taken: This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they 40 aduentured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remoone of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparts. Thereneeded vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them joyntly should fet their handes to the getting of it; which no fooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was joyfully welcommed. Hee was deserredly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that hee might the better entitle himfelfe thereto, he caused the libertie of the Argines to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councellof Achaia; whereby the Acheans were not more strengthened, than the Argines 50 themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped. Afterthis, Titus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who

ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipiothe African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his defire, of being fent Commander into Greece. The vnfincere meaning of Anticchus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthie of regard : yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Atolians, and of throughly perfwading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to affure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their fole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, til occasion should be ripe, and call them over againe. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at 10 any neere distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counfaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like ( which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what liers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those pla- 20 ces. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testific their good liking of that which Titus had faid and done : asalfo (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin fold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end: and by leaving the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vintainted by jelousie and suspition of any enill meaning. At his comming to the Citie, Hee had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had untill that day beheld. Three dayes together the Thew of his pompe continued: as being fet out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthie of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had 30 before made Warre. All forts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuers forts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of fundrie kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shieldes, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citic in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were 40 principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captines, by his procurement redeemed from

Notiong after his Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers; excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had beene his Counsailors; because their businesse was said to bee, somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadours wondred. They said vnto Tinus and his Associates, That they could not discerne wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of 50 peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; betweene those, that having warred together, were vpon equall termes of advantage; or betweene those that had lived alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor; they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and pariently endure

the impolition of fome Couenants, that elfe might feeme vareasonable. Where Warre had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it viuall to demaund and make reftitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or loft; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betweene those which had never failen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed : since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might bee troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friendihip that had beene fo long in conclution, betwixt Antioches and the Romans. Which being for they held it strange, that the Romans 10 should thus inlift on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Alia he should set at libertie; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintim answered. That fince they went so distinctly to worke, Hee would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would fecke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them for beare to meddle in Asia, that then Hee should abandon whatfocuer hee had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but 50 20 reasonable nor pertinent answere, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the girt of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna. Lampfacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that fought their love, and had never done them injurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lyfimachia, whereon of late he had bin at fo much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it withinhabitants, that had all beene dispersed, or captine to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation 20 alleadged : faying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans ; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to fet at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subje-Aion: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard under the patronage, which Reme had affoorded unto all Greece befides. By this colour they might foone have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbeare to say, That, valeffebe would quit what hee held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: 40 namely (as might be evnder flood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadours to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answere, which the Embassadours could not hereto make; little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to bee entreated, and were contented once againe to fend ouer P. Villius, and others that had beene alreadic with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a finall answere, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Affociates would bee accepted, yea, or no. By this refpite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Intiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no

50 disposition to let him live in peace.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spamiards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Injuries done by MASA-NISSA to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for instice in vaine.

He Insubrians, Boijans, and other of the Cifalpine Gaules, together to with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mage departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were vtterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, having served vnder Mage for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilear a Carthagiman, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene alreadie shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in 20 Gallia Cifalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long fince rehearfed, betweene the first and second Punick Warres. As also it hath fince appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the reconquest would have beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armics abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene diftracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a front Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practifed in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but foorthwith readie to fight againe, 20 Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: fo as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor belieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might give contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they ferued excellently well, to traine up the Roman Souldiors to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and line contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territoric of their borderers, that were sub- 40 iect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, scemes to have beene grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement; and to acknowledge no fuch vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vling their aduantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vic commonly this answere, It hath still beene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave vnto the 50 Romans; but many more, and greater, they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it agains as often, when they thought it profitable fo to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harme:

not fending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not

of the Historie of the World.

CHAP.5. S.5.

how to make warre, faue on their owne ground. The Countrie of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subject vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian thewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading youn any fide of it, the further parts would rife from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those To parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and casily stirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among them selues; and beeing divided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnited themselines together, for chacing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of libertie, rather than com-20 plaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make euacuation of this Chollerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to bee viquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and vied them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayled upon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexterititie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the service of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to have much businesse with them. Spaine was too farre distant, and withall too 30 great, for them to fend ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might scrue to hold it in obedience perforce; and fuch heedfull Captaines, as might bee still readie to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace. Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards thould one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the 40 Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselues against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted fine veeres. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre; which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconful, whom they flew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to fend thither two

50 Prators, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yeere following, and fent into that Province; found at his comming little leffe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniar ds were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them; they role against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him to much new trouble. Whilest hee was about to make a journie against those that were as yet vnsubdued; some of the lately vanquished, were even readie to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very gricfe. Hearing of this, and well understanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them; and commending vnto them peace and quietneffe, which they never had diflurbed but vnto their owne great losse, He praied them to deuise what course might betaken for holding them affured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of 10 them could, or would give counsaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subiect; He gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industrie finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen : excuting the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, hee could pay them with the Enemies monic. Finally Hee brought the Warre to so good end, 20 that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being loft. He increased also the publike Revenues in that Province, by cauting fome Mynes of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agrecable to his owne

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well bee then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all othery feful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might feeme requifite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. Hee was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any businesse either private or 30 publike. Many Bookes he wrote: wherof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of husbandrie. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodiehee was, and exceeding temperate: fo as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better fort of the Romans, was his great finceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited fingular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthic men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaui- 40 our. Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so carnestly; that even vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselse, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his own defence : and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galbavnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitic of Cato his family, which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vican: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two enery yeere were sent ouer Commanunders into Spaine (that was divided into two energy yeere were sent oner Commanders into Spaine (that was divided into two Governments) did rarely faile of such worke; as might assord the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battaile: another tooke siftie Town; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus energy one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I have alreadic pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spaine required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Caso thence departed, vntil the 10 Numantian Warre brake out; which was verie long after. In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, voto themselves and their obedient Citie: Majaniffa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the leffer Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This countrie the Numidian challenged, and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, 20 without leave obtained from their Mafters the Romans. They had none other way of redreffe, than by fending to Rametheir Complaint of his doings. And furely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the ludges had been unpartiall. For belides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Ma/anissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, defired leave of the Carthaginians, for him elfe to paffe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This not with flanding, Majaniffa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vinderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were and 30 how il-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been fent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some suspition of his errand, yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded. That certainly it was their purpose rorcbell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe. As for the Countrie of Emperia: it had alwayes, he faid, beene theirs, that were able to hold it by firong hand; and fo belonged fometimes vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if trueth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Gitie stood; or scarcely to so much. 40 For they were no better than ftrangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground, as they could encompasse with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. What soeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encrochments. This confidered, Majaniffa requested of the Senate, That they would not adjudge vnto fuch vsurpers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the suddentell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them

frican was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuerfic: yet feerely giving them infructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaffadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Mafanifa with a firong Armie should quickly prevaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not oncly from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them , when the Romans had leifure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

٧I.

The Atolians labour to pronoke ANTIOCHYS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre woon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS besiegeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achaa. The exact skill of PHILOP @- 10 MEN, in aduantage of ground: whereby he wtterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTI-OCHYS being denied Peace by the Romans, joynes with the Etolians. The Etolians (urprize DEMETRIAS; and by killing NABIS, their Confederate leize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at PHILOPOMEN his perswasions annex themselves to the Achaans.

LL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselues the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputative. on among the Greeker; were not onely disappointed of their couetous 20 hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might have well sufficed them, if their desires had not beene immoderate: and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselues to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnsufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuiled, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a for- 20 rowfull knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmitte and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to ioyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre furmount those of the Romans, Acheans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a greatenterprile, which the Atolians tooke in hand; and well befeeming them, for they were great darers. They fent Embaffadours to all these Kings, with perswasions as they thought most forcible. But Phi- 40 lip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie sirst all other courses. Nabis the Lacedamonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochiu) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward; and not staying so much as to feeke any good pretence, beganne immediatly to lay fiege to Gyttheum, that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Acheans, to whole care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not flow to admonish Nabis of his ductie: neither would they have staied long from repressing his violence by open warre; had not some of them thought it wisedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in 50 sending Embassadours, and were aduised by Quinting to let all alone, and to waite for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

Philopamen was then Prætor of the Acheans, who had long been absent in Crete;

CHAP.5. S.6. of the Historie of the World. making war there for his mindes fake and recreation. Vnto him the Acheans referred themselues, giving him leave to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying untill the Formans came; or doing otherwise, as hee should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gyttheum, by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Acham Garrison within it, should bee lost, if hee ysed any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a ftrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeeres agoe been counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauic of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was therest of his Fleete fo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedamonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed to himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, forang fo many leakes, and tooke in water fo fast, that the was faine to veeld without further relistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were prefently discouraged, and saued themselves with what speede they could. But Philopamen was not herewith danted. If hee had tailed in Sea-fervice, which was none of his Occupation, Hee faid, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the fiege of Gyttheum to fron the Acheans if they should inuade his Countrie. But you these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came inexpected; fired their Campe; 20 and put all, faue a very few of them, to the fword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedamon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the T yrant mer him that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nahis would have been ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; having their Horse, & the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome 30 of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That having with him there such a number of Souldiours, ordered and forted in fuch manner, and marching rowards fuch a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would be put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a fland? what piece of ground it were meete for him to feize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it? in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and under what Gard? in what fort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuali 40 meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that hee neuer mette with any difficultie. whence he could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and having drawne up his Rere, Hee encamped neare unto the place where he was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke: whereto the Acheans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and layd an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabio fell, and were flaughtered 50 in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him , that the Acheans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lacedemon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the

Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recourry of their

freedome. The Tyranthearing this, marched haltily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies hee made to flay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Campe; and gaue chace to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopæmen conceived aright, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilest it was day, Hee led 10 forth the rest that had well refreshed themselues, and occupied the two most ordinarie passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopamens Campegreat flore of lights; thought that all had been at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopamen waste the Countrey round about, whilest Nabis durst not issue foorth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassaddours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew 20 to be follicited by the Ætolians. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promifes drew him to make shew, whatsocuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receive other fauours at their hands; and regaine poffession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilest their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would veeld vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long abfence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, 20 which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from gining audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answere as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue beene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephelus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fied vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that hee, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lived , HAN-40 NIBALiudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldest thou have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee ? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were fo, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbeare awhile to vie his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King : and plainely defiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He 50 casily recovered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee never should bee friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine furmises: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, folong would Hannibal doe him all good feruice: whereas contrariwife if he intended to make peace, then should it behoove him to vse the counsaile of some other

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no leffe bufie all this while, in making their partic strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victoric against Philip; that finally they prevailed with him: especially when the Roman Embassadors had 10 left him without hope of peace, vnlesse hee would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like fort with the Macedonian. But in vaine. Hee vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forcesto the vtmost: asknowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselues, without helpe from any; sauc onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embasfadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay necre at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were conten-20 ted to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the bulines worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselte against the Romans: it would bee no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore hee came to their Panatolium, or great Assemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ferue to appeale them. Hee willed them to confider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field. on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochius, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Etolians as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becomming *the Sticklers. As *Lin.L25.ad-30 for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent missis Actolisa courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better forte, lanisting they might doe to fend Embassadours to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed , were not good) make request to have what they defined: than thus to fet the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he sayd, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to 40 obtains what they defired either as their right, or elfe by way of fauour. For with fuch Termes had they beene feafted once already: and were by the Senate reie-Red vnto Titus: who, having it in his owne power, gaue them no fatisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely loffe of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoethey made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to fet the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controversies depending betweene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauerie, wher by to yount themselves to the Kings Embasso sadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this nevy Decree. The Prætor answered, That then hee had other things to do: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italy vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Etolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more private Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritic of a generall Assembly. The Apolleti (so were the Prinic Councell of £tolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could have done. They lay da plotte, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they fent men for the purpole. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quinting, had been driven to flee thence, but was, by interceffion of those that lo- 10 ued him againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chaleis they foed not fo well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so firong, that their purpose was discouered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentleanswer, saying, That they came not thither as enemics, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more infolently dominered ouer it, than ener the Macedonians had done. By which Rhethoricke they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither 20 found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injurie. So this busines was dasht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; styling himselfe King: but, more truely by all men called Tyrant. He had wel-neare lost all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately given him: fince, he durft not flirre abroad, and dayly expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatned him. Wherfore he lent mellengers, one after another, to the Atolians; requesting them, That as He had not been flow to firre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe your the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to 20 fend him what helpe they might, fince his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often fayd, That the raucnous Atolians were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannie, were in a manner confumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to affure Lacedamon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were comman- 40 ded to be no wifer than they should bee, nor to thinke that they were fent to make warre with the Achaans, or to doe ought elfe, fauc onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reafon; yet must they understand, that unlesse they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: fince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would fuffice to tread them downe. As for the Ltolians, Hee said, that if need should so re- 50 quire, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raife: But that they were very defirous at the prefent, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to fend him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit : which done, he ftill returned againe to Nabis. But when he faw time for the great worke that he had in hand : Hee then went alide to his thirtie Horseno men, and bade them remember the taske enjoyned them at their fetting foorth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, valesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithallthe Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the fudden; and struck him downe. The thirtie Ætolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the T yrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in stead of seeking revenge, they stood soolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians hasted into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where hee fell 20 to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were alreadic done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens : who seeing themfelues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to fee those that had flaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall flocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiese. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idely stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were flaine in keeping the Citadell; and 20 those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who folde them all as bond-flaucs. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedamon. Philopæmen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such wordes vnto them, as Alexamenus should have done after hee had slaine the Tvrant: easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themfelues with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no leffe dishonourable than difficult, of the Atolians, and the small, but effectuall, travaile of Philopærsen; the Achaans made a notable purchase : and Lacedamon, that had hitherto bingouerned eyther by Kings, or by T yrants that called themselues Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had scarce any reputation,

VII.

ANTIOCHUS, per/waded by THOAS the Etolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundric passages betweene him, the Etolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubaa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Atolians, with the Civil answere of TITVS to their discourse, before the Acheans. That it concerned the Greekes to have defired peace, betweene the Romans and ANTIOCHUS; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many pettie Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER; and an idle vanitie, by which 10 King PHILIP was loft. HANNIBAL gives good counsaile in vaine, Some Townes wonne in The (alie). The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reucls away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Conful all for fake ANTIOCHUS. Hee with two thousand Atolians keepes the Streights of Thermopyla. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

NTIOCHUS was troubled much in Alia with Smyrna and Lamplacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to 20 winne them by force, was more than hitherto hee was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed convenient to shew himselfe in Greece;

where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countric there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie up in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Atolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were readie to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made fuch a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King 30 was thinking to fend Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had alreadic taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should give him entertaiment, whence hee might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did ferue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Theas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forcesat fuch a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece. might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence : and fecondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not bee chosen a more vnst 40 man to be employed in the Kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing under such a notable Commaunder is his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuerthelesse if Hannibal prevailed; Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard hee was of opinion, That fuch a renowned Warriour should bee alwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to give aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good fuccesse would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the fourraigne Command; even of the King himfelfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being icalous of the vertue, that shi- 50 ned brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought voon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuo-

lous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-fide to Ilium; there to do facrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence paffing ouer the Aegean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whome the Atolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Heetherefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie. came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a figne of good lucke, to bee fo entertained at the beginning. But it may bee suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that to of Xerkes: they faw three hundred ihips, of which no more than fortie were feruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thousand Foot, fine hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Aetolians no fooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. Heknew before that they would fo doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Aetolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration : wherein hee defired them to hold him excused, that hee came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he faid, in true estimation a signe of his good will : in that hee said not to 20 make all things readie; but hasted vnto their aid, euen whilest the scason was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authoritie out of Grecce; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Actolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not becany way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, ha-20 uing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in need. So be left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betweene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus ) That they would yeeld vnto the Kings desire, and ashit him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiechus, in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell : the Actolians, for gaine of two 40 or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might have deceived them; were like to have abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And whatremedie had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thous, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answere, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Those would therefore have pronounced to bee very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it prooued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute 50 where they should beginne the Warre. Chaleis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture need to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Actolia but a thoufand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these hee hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolzans beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsefull, they faid would never be obtained; untill by remooning the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie seuerall Etiate had where to find redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans : who neverthelesse desired them onely, so to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at 10 the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answere, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselues, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or lived otherwise than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselse, to deliuer Cities that were alreadic free. But since hee, and the Atolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Atolians, to doe a 20 friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answere the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, hee brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had fent for their defence.

The chiefe Citic of Eubea being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or fine hundred Roman Souldiers, that came oner late so have defended Chalcin, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Baotia, lying oner against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grone, consecrated vnto Spollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuarie. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselse in many vaine Treaties of peace; tooke advantage of their carelessenselse, and see their carelessenselse, and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his 40 part. The wifer fort returned such answere, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referued themselues until hee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; sauc the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Atolians, and now feared the Atheans. Little reason there was, that hee should thinke to draw the Acheans to his partie. Neuerthelesse hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuic, which Titus was faid to beare vnto Philopamens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Atolians fent 50 Embatladours to the Councell at Agium; that spared not brave wordes, if the Acheans would have so beene taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming: reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans and Cadufians; names that were not enery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be relisted. Now concerning monie and all warlike furniture: it was, he faid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Afia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceiued: who confidering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would prooue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vimoli parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilest He tooke order with the Romans. To the 10 same effect spake the Atolian Embassadour: and further added, That in the battell at Cynoscephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both Hee and his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Atolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answere, as could haue beene defired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Etolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vant themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lineked the King and the Atolians together. For even fuch bragges as herethey made, be-20 fore the Acheans who knew them to beliers, had the Atolians also made unto King Antiochus: proclayming the victorie ouer Philip to bee meerely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to bee dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, fuch as were wont to be fold about for bondflaues, and good for little else. These divers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chaleis (no such vanter as were these Embasfadours) had fometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat hee wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than so many pieces of one 30 tame fwine, dreft after severall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore afide this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, not with standing all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armie he was faine in a manner, to begge victualles of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at viurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie: from Demetrics to Lamia; thence backe to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith fince both Antiochus and the Aetolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps alreadic they did, repent, whilest wifer men tooke beed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perswasion is needlesse. 40 The Acheans did not love so well the Aetolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abiects. Wherefore they flood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he fped in Eubera, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaymed war against him, and against the Aetolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inveterate: sufficiently appears in the storie foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Aetolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and lest the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have beenedesired, than that they might never finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to have sought, not how Smyrns and Lampsacus might recover their libertie (which had never beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept as sunder by their Countrie, as two

Scas

Seas by an Islamus or necke of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their leeking to make free those base Assatigues, which originally were Greekiss; than the generall applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimalizand the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of seare, that should move them to take armes even in their owne desence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promissing joyntly to affish the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, when soe were sing Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrie, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselues altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactours. All the rest gaue doubtfull answeres of hope vnto both sides : or if some few, as did the The flatians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselucs his enemies, till hee pressed them with open force. The Bastians willingly received him, as foone as hec entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, 20 besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vanted himselse to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his fifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Etolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title 20 as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto sit behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effe-Red as much as they defired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him ) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynoscephale, there to gather vp the bones of the flaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburi- 40 ed. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to understand, that hee was readie with all his power to aid them wherein soeuer they should be pleased to vie him.

The Etolians, Magnetians, Eubwans, Bwotians, and Athamanians, having now all ioyned with him; Antiochus tooke counfaile of them about the profecution of the warrein hand. The chiefe quefition was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessale, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, 50 and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alleadge; as in a matter of great importance. Hamibal was at this meeting: who had long beene cast aside, as a vessell of no vse; but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vt-

CHAP.5. S.7. of the Historie of the World. ter, was even the same which hee would have spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked fince their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians . Bastians . and other their good friends, which now so willingly tooke their parts: what were they elfe than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adjoyne themselves for searcy onto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they faw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrary fide, alleadging the same feare for their exerse? wherefore hee thought most behoovefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (belides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to recoyle and for fake them at his plea-10 fure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very firong Argument: though indeed what neede was there, of prooning by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, faid Hee, Thefe Etolians bere prefent; and namely, this T no A s, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then veed to excite the King unto this Expedition, infisted mainly on the same point. He told us that PHILIP was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly in colonce of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine breake loofe. If this be for let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, 20 that he may regaine his libertie, and fatisfic his angry stomacke, upon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prooue otherwise, and that his feare be greater than bis indignation : then shall it behove vs to looke unto him, that hee may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your some SELEVCV s is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if PHILIP will not hearken to your Embaffage; let SELEVCVS be in readines, to fall upon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other fide, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIPs and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the mannaging of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereto had you then given eare, the Romans by this time should have heard other newes, than that Chal-20 cis in Eubamas become ours. Italie and Gaule should have beene on fire with warre: and. little to their comfort, they (hould have under stood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I fee what should hinder vs even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleete and Armie hither (but in any case let Shippes of burden come along with them, loaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were even readie to follow vs into Italie: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice: who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all forts of warre: yet how to warre with 40 the Romans . I have been instructed by long experience, both to their coft and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I give, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution: but what counfaile foeuer you shall please to follow, I wish it may bec prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said hee had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; faue onely that one was lent into Alia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Theffalie, about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne firength, were glad to make submission. But Lariss, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their faith 50 and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M.Babiue, a Roman Proprætor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselse Enemie vnto Antiochus: where by the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew fuch, as wrought more than the fuccour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene comming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; Hee brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the fouldiors as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he tooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loofe manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, 10 and helpe him to reclaime them from this loofenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot , whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nafica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre leffe credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had beene long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught 20 them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prærogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should affoord him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Bouans: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more abilitie in matter of warre. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot two thoufand Horse, and fisteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Agypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochin : and Philip King of Micedon; had lately fent Em- 30 bassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his sorces into Ætolia, there to affist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good carnest. But hee was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips Embassadors answere was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the affistance that Hee should give to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they 40 would fend partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masanissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Conful fine hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertooke to fet out a Fleet at their owne charges : and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to bee discharged by many veerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastic and ridiculousiffue of this war, that began with such noyse and pro- 50 parations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Afiatick fouldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should again for sake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places; and the Roman Conful being arrived, against whom none made relistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Ammanders wife, was taken by the Conful; made a mocking flocke; and fent away prifoner to Rome, The The salars vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antischus, compounding onely for their owne lives. To and departing ynarmed: yet fo, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who hauing withdrawne himselfe to Chaleis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and faid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promises of the Atolians meerely verball; and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wife man, year a very Prophet, that had forefeene all this long before. Nevertheleffe He fent word to the £tolians, that they should now make readie all their forces: as confidering their owne need to bee no leffe than 20 his. But the £tolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vo the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which iouned with him. Hereat the King was angrie : and could get no better fatisfaction, than that Thous and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to have made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greese would appeare in this time of danger : He seized vpon the Streights of Thermopyle: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should

30 come. Of the Streights of Thermopylathere hath beene spoken enough * before, *1.3.6.6.5.3 vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armic of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to paffe that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one halfe of Greece: vnleffe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this paffage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Countrey. The latter, having taken upon him to doc great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place,

40 when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armic. There whilest he lay, Hee sent earnest messages one after other to the Atolians, entreating them not to forfake him thus: but at least wife now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vndertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemie to ascend. The Roman Consul in like fort, prepared to force the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by fickenesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Consuls. These he sent forth by night 50 with two thousand men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armic: not onely by telling them, with what base-conditioned enemies they had to deale : but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night cate had a fore journey ( for what Mmmmmm 2

happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, faue onely that hee failed in his intent and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp Heepie Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves; whilest Hee, being a vericable man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselse. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no fuch trouble of climbing : neyther had this en- 10 trance of the Thermopyla beene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any trauailers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Caro followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discovered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Ætolians verie neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore fent foorth a luftie Crue of his men, whom he thought fitteft for that service; and willed them by any meanes to get him fome prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Atolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Etolians; ouer- 20 threw them; flue a great part of them; and chaced the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadic begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it felfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hil-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Atolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men; but when the Roman armes and enfignes were dif- 30 couered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of relistance; but all of them for looke the Campe, and fled. The flanghter was not great: for that the badneffe of the way did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this dayes loffe draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcu; and from thence with the first opportunitie.got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: fetting open their gates; and prefenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recoursed that Antiochus had gained : the Atolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consulgine them any respite. 40 At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victorie was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Atolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Conful should beflege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Conful should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Conful, having wonne Heracles, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopyle, 50 Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was readic to case him of his charge.

The loffe of Heraclea did so affright the Ltolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they fent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to for sake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aid. They prayed him to confider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ex tolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might ferue to defray the charges of the Warre: promiting that ere long he would fend them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thous, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might virge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them: then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Conful would scarce vouch safe to give them audience, but said Hee had other businesse in hand: onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerises Flaceus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as 20 much, as they would have delivered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deferued of the Romans. Whereto Flacous would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so even betimes, than to flay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadours to the Consul. This phrase of committing voto the faith; signified, in their vie of it, littleelfe, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the cra-30 uing of pardon. But the Romans vied those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * reelding to diferetion. Wherefore when the Conful heard them * Legal, except, speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to epolib.13. their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayde Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse private or publike: then, That yee deliuer up vnto me Dicearchus the Atolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and fuch of his Countrimen as have followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who 40 had yeelded themselves onto his faith; not onto slaverie. What? (saide the Consul) Doe yee stand to pleade Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring bither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto eueric one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to fay. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, fince they came as Embassadours; though since. their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocletior ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause Hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce

This furcesance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had been commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his

Armie, like one that could not bee trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was defired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busic with the Atolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all athamania, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Atolians, hearing what had befalle their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen 10 from before Lamia, yet not being far gone the ace. His monie Nicander conveighed into Lamia, by verie vnusuall dexteritie. But hee himselse being to passe further to the Assembly of the Etolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was veric much perplexed about this his journie, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduenture : and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman fide , fell vpon a Station of Macedonians by whom hee was taken. and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his servants to entreat Wicander friendly; and hee himselfe being then 20 at supper, did visit him as soone as heerose vp : giving him to vnderstand; That the Atolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse; for as much as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He faid, high time for them to hane regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would bee much more analicable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signific vn- 20 to his Countrimen, and privately to hold in minde the courtesie which hee then did him, in fending him fafe home. So giving him a Convoy to gard him to Hypata; Hee louingly dismissed bim. For this benefit, Nicander was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselse suspected vnto the Romans and therefore was had away to Rome, where he

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submisfion, in such wise as he required it: hee foorthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to trie what 40 they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong Citic, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that hee should have beene a loser, by rifing from before it without Victorie. So He staid there welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Acheans made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in fuch places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Atolian fide; and followed it, in taking part to with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good wordes; whereby they faued themselves from trouble awhile. The Meffenians being more frout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent

CHAP.5. S.7. of the Historie of the World, word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A mellage from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armic, and finith the Warre: as also the peremptorie Commaund of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Achaans; yet could not like it well, that eyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against anie of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the He of Zacynthus which had once beene Philips, and was afterward ginen by him to Aminander who fent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Hand to the Acheans; whom hee found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainely told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselues vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tor-20 toile, whereof Peloponne [us was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needes bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Haning settled things thus in Peloponnesus, Hec went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might have beene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had vpon the Etolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriuing fo fast: Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadours to Rome; and submitting themselues, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupačius was in great danger : else would not the Etolians have made such earnest suit as they did 30 vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene fure to carrie it, in any short space : it may well bee thought hee would not have gone away without it; fince the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promifed submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome, no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of thefetwo; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thouland Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which what it signified, they now under-40 ftood. Wherefore they defired to haue it fet downe, in what points, and how farre vaine attendance. Whilest the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to fet things in order among the tractable Acheans. Hee would have had them to restore the banished Lacedamonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowshippe of their Common-wealth. This the Acheans liked well enough : but they did not like it, that the Romans should bee meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deso ferred the restitution of the banished Lacedamonians; intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were desirous to bee admitted; and saw that they should have their desire, without foorth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But heereof they could get no certaine answere: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and fuch compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Liuius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sca with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twentie faile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenides being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedie retrait.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the &tolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happie when 10 by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contraries side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemic of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his yonger sonne; whom some sew yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee desired the Senate not to foreslow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his affiltance, wherein foeuer it pleafed them to vie it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but hee was the friend of Fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of 20. the Contention, that the Romans were like to hauethe vpper hand. The same did Antiochis now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephelus, as if hee had beene in another World: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would some bethere, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

Lycivs Scipio, having with him PVBLIVs the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is fent into Greece, He grants long Truce to the Etolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and divers fights. An inualion upon Ev MENEs his Kingdome; with the fiege of Pergamus, rayled by an handfull of the Acheans. L. Scipio the Conful comes into Afia: where ANTIOCHUS most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of MAG-NESIA: wherein ANTIOCHVS being vanquished, reeldethiothe Romans good pleafure. The Conditions of the peace. In what fort the Romans vsed their Victorie. L. CORNELIUS SCIPIO, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer ANTIOCHUS, is furnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

WCIVS CORNELIVS SCIPIO, the brother of P Scipio the African, was chosen Conful at Rome with C. Lelius. Lalius was verie gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment; offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate; if L. Cornelius would be sopleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise 50 fomewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African Said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochin, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with fuch approbation, that the controuersic was foorth with at an end. For if Antiochus relyed youn Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Capraine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against the same Great Worthie? But indeed a worser man might have served well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in confultation; where his wildome was much approved, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthic of remembrance; as a figne of the freedome that he vsed in his censures, even whilest belied in fuch a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may feeme, to have made him wish, that hee had beene ferto ued by fuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horfer, and Elephants, with fuch coftly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleafing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and when ther all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (faid Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backes of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answere pleased the King ; it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, tellifies that his diflike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of

The Scipio's made all hafte away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, befides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about fine thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirtie-Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Amylius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conful Glibrio belieging amphylla a Citie of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessely, as in a time of confusion, they had left ungarded the last vecre. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation,

30 and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long fince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the fudden; was carried at the fecond affault. Thence went Hee to Amphy fa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and fine hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphy sla was presently for saken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Etolians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words : and willed them to perswade the Actolians; that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly

40 taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them ingood hope; yet the Conful made still the same answere, with which they had beene chaced from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for alonger time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpefull commoditie which time should affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeeres Truce: after which, the Winter was like to affoord them another halfe yeeres leifure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loft, which with held the Warre from paffing ouer into Alia.

The bufineffe of Ætolia being thus laide afide: and the olde Conful Glabrio fent 50 home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Theffalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vinto the Hellespont. Yetthey confidred, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyaltic of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischiefe by the way, if hee were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would he be vnfaithfull, though he were not fo couragious; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuales, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his surtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and observe his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merric at a scast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of victualies he had made for the Armic, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracehus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, 10 found all things in a readines, that might helpe to advance their journey. The King entertayned them royally; and brought them on their way, even to the Hellespont: where they stayed a good while, vntill their Nauic was in readinesse to transport

Much was done at Sca in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countreymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sca; thought to doc somewhat vpon those that were fo carly in their diligence, before their followes should arrive to helpe them. Yet 20 went he craftily to worke; and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admiral grew fo careleffe, expecting fill when he should receiue a watchword from Polyxenidas, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleet fetting foorth from Ephelus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauen. Paufifratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, shought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; fo to gard the mouth of it: 30 for that he saw no likelihood of desending himselse by Sea. But Polyxenidas had alreadiclanded some companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Paulistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and sunke or boorded all his Nauie, fine excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head : and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemie : who having not bethought himselse what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies, for feare lest they should burne, together with themselues, a part of the Kings 40

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidus could not take such advantage as hee had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driven backe againe by the like soule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentic other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great braverie, presented battaile to Polyxenidus before the Hauen of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were so hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to for fake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea

and Pergamus: and leaving his sonne Seleucus to beliege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had reason to frand in feare being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thoufand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Acheans: old souldiors all, and trayned vp under Philopamen; whose Scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to dild une, that fuch men as they to should hold him belieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hillfoot, feeing that none durst fallie foorth vpon them, grew so carelesse: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behind their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie, Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus; and told him that hee would goe foorth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achean would needes have his will: and iffuing forth, encamped not farre from the Enemic. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they faw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iest of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stout-20 ly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiuing. Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might: and he himselse, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie sew of the enemies had their Horses readie saddled, but more sew, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as He draue them all out of their Campe; and chaced them as sarre as he might safely aduenture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this spectacle) were very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet would they not therefore issue sew to should the safet.

30 ans in doing what remained to bee done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and against him went foorth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was surther off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemie was in fight: but as soone as the ground betweene them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all haste, & soone outraking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Acheans, and the basensse of his owner men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to his honour.

40 Such being the qualitic of these Assaults; Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That hee enused their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiors betooke themselves to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of war might have cut all their throates, even as they were tipling in their victualing houses; which Philopamen said that he would have done, had He beene Generall of the Acheans, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of bulines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a sew of his Horseand light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath to beene shewed, and went to Elea: whither hee heard that Amylines come, to being successful. There hee made an Ouerture of mirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Amylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brakeoff. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, source or fine Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King : and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus. was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and having the victoric taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, vet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces vnto the war the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sca, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The bat- 10 taile was fought by Myonnefus a Promontoric in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fine of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couerall the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftic Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twentie: the Roman being the ftronger built, and more floutly manned; the Rhodian more light timberd and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same device; with which, fine of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid open his fide: 20 and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoy sted saile: and having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behind them : whereof thirteene were taken : all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this miladuenture, may seeme to have taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the beliegers (if the liege had beene continued obstinately) to termes of great extre- 30 mitie. He also gaue over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save onely of desence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law.

King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Conful, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellefpont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that Heelanded quietly at his owne good case; euen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadie. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him 40 from obtayning peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that hee should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampfacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadie given ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to firiue with the Romansabout Lampfacus and Smyrna; what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise delivered into their handes: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take fome part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not bee 50 vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their handes. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune: Hee expected their answere. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King thould beare all the charges of the warre, tince it began through his onely fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which hee held in £olis and Ionia; but quite out of Alia the leffe, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embaffadour therefore law, that no better bargaine could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private; and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by to the King. Scipto would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restirution of his sonne, than vpon Condition. That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publike businesse: Hee onely faid thus much, That fince Antiochus had alreadie for laken Lysimachia, and fuffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, faid He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

Снар.5. §.8.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For feeing that the Conful demanded of him no leffe, than if hee had been alreadie subdued: little reason 30 there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein hee could lose, as hee thought, no more, than by feeking to avoid it he mutt give away. He had with him threescore and tenthousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleased, to heare that the Conful drew neere him apace, as one hastning to fight. But howfocuer hee was affected; Hee made so little shew of searc, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ficke at Elaa, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ransome : as one both defirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his fickenes, and withall not defirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his boun-30 tie to bee constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein he dealt crastily. For fince he could have none other ransome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great flore of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe fuch a courtefie before the battell, as would afterwards have beene little worth; than to flav untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recourse of his sonne: so as the joy thereof was thought to have beene much availeable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie. He said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present. I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by adulting him not to fight, vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conie-40 cture. Antiochus resolued to sollow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnelia by Sipplus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. This ther followed him L. Scipio the Conful; and fate downs within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whomat first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driven backe over the River. Two dayes were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and an balfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were 50 taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote:

whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought foorth their Armies; and fet them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fitt day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Con-

ful tooke advice what was to bee done. For either they must fight your what soe. uer disaduantage, or else resolue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subject vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place: and so deferre the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie. that this great Armic should bee assailed, even in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to fet vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being 10 loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in seare of the Enemie, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailes: He also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might underfland his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie confisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were fluethouland and foure hundred men. The Latines, as viually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: afterthem followed the Principes, at such distance as was vivall; and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly 20 Acheans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equali Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmost of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which. Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the river: yet foure Troups of horse were placed there, though fuch helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conful had with him fixeteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would have served to discourage hismen; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more 30 couragious beafts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diverfly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the seuerall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vie. The maine strength of his Foote confisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These Hee placed in the middest, and divided into tenne Battalions: every one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene cuery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beafts, and fuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Crefts, Towres on their backes, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, soure men in euery Tower, madea gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these 40 were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, divided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been stretched out in Front. Adioyning to these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the fame name, that had ferued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and five 50 hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Cirtaans, and Elymaans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seuen hundred of divers

Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon fate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrteans, Elymeans, and many others, haning also with them fixteene Elephants. Antiochus himfelfe commanded in the right wing: Selencus in the left: and three of his principall Captaines commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one being like to terrific the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eafily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showtings, and noyles, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running backe voon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no relistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or 20 norelistance; but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King. Intiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile; and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flancked with Horse: gaue vpon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amplius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iffued foorth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were alreadic victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approch; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled 20 into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile siftie thousand Foot, and fource thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers fine and twentie.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apames, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodic of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townsfmen and Souldiors were fo dismaved with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answere, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this fide of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fifteene thousand Talents: fine bundred in hand; two thousand and flue hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store 50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thors the Etolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this warre, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might fo easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demaunds; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to fend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Confulschosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and en. Manlius Vollo. The . Etolians desired peace, but could not obtain it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed. That one of the Confuls should make Warre youn the Atolians. the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was alreadic vanguished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands : yet fince the State of Asia was not like to bee 10 fo throughly fettled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out worthic of the Romans care; Cn. Manling, to whom Afia fell by lot, had not his Province

Soone after this came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally appropued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his owne deferts: and comparing himselfe with Masanista, hoped that the Romans would bee more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, 20 fince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and fince both he and his father had alwayes beene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adocto make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselse to their courtese; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Countrie by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themfelues with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Alia side. For since the most of those Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should begainers by his ouerthrow. The 30 Rhodians did not like of this. They defired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had beene subject voto Philip, and served him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they infifted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaue away fo much, that eucry one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe 40 whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now for a finuch as the furname of The African had been given vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by fome, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Afratick : which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no

of the Historie of the World. d. IX.

The Atolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fv Lv Ivs and MANLIVS. MANLIVS hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other obsections ) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by SIBYL. Of SIBYL'S Prophecies: the Bookes of HER-MES; and that Inscription, SIMONIDEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipioes; and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

Arc. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now flyled Afiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at conce to Greece and to Asa. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had graunted to long a Truce to the Atolians. But fince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not fought to humble it selfe to the Roman Maiestie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vponthe Ætolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Em-20 baffadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athemans to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so deiected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuile, even vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries loft, where they fpied advantage. Poore Kin Aminander lived in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept. for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accustomed to serve a Mountaine Lord, that conversed with them after an homelic manner; could not endure the proud and infolent manner of commaund, vfed by 30 the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their feruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grewthey, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet affurance, that all the reft would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Atolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers having divided themselves into source parts, occupied, by the readic assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vse. The fame of this good successe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of 40 Philip vnable to thinke vpon relitance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby some leifure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loft. Philip had brought from home fix thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march. he left all faue two thou and behind him, & fo came to Athenaum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take place lying ouer Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend upon Argithea; or that they might perceive the Athamanians, 50 all along the nill fides, readic to come downe vpon them, when they should be bufie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a fafe retreat: specially when Aminander came in light with his thousand Atolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and prefently withdrawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. Nnnnnn 3

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layd them, and purited them so closely. that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes; few oftholeescaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vetill Philip his returne.

The Atolians, having found the businesse of Athamania so casic, made attempt. in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Atolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had been euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first : but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours readie to fight 10 with them in the Atolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if hee meant not to returne.

Of these victories the iou was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recoursed his owne from Philip with such helpe as hee could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citic, that had beene the chiefe leate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. 20 With this hee began; for that it was of too great importance to bee abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them bee relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vponequall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at lea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with fo many at once; and therefore as carneftly fought peace with the Romans, as they floutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who befought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any vio- 20 lence of the affaylants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so be driven to leave vnto his fucceffor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the . Atolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-dearc, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leave to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his perswasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnsufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians accom- 40 panied those of the Atolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made very grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Atolians were bound to vphold the maiestic of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselues (as not long since 50 they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to for beare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was fet downe an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Iudges of the controuersies, when they should arise, And hereof good vie will be shortly made: when want of employment elswhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, youn the affaires of Macedon and

of the Historie of the World,

Cn. Manlius, the other Confull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. Hee visited those Countries on the hither fide of Taures, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some pettie Lords, or Tyrants, 10 fome free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the greatalteration hapned in Asia. From every of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootic, when, having fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallogreekes. These had long dominiered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they served vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon 20 the River Halys, in an Inland Countrie, where those enemies were not like to fearch them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then wasno counsaile thought so good, as to for sake their houses and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or drive, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and vichuailed for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortistcation as promifed greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, 20 when he had staied there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careleffe of furnishing themselues with casting weapons, as if the stones would have served well enough to that purpose : the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in difaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did casily prevaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallogreekes, neither exercised in that manner. of fight, nor having prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a sit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive armes, could not hold out against the arrowes and 49 weapons of the Roman light armature : but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of the men escaped aliue: all their wives, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them faued themselues by flight, as having fairer way

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconful his Province for another yeere. Fuluius, in his so second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlin gave peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselues for seare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all, what profit he could: and laide vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto Zin.139.

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom hee sent for that purpole. Finally having let in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogreekes had in fo many yeares extorted, from the wealthie Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vie, which the Roman fouldier had beene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houlhold-Russe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betweene Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlins came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not fo well containe themselues. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gave the Romans 20 to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselse three thousand talents, and sistie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promising moreover to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been etaken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betweene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to give away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonnesus and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they beflowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. 30 He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into necre acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africk. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates affifting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore faw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregar- 40 ded.contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had is yned with Antiochus and the Atolians, by whom he might have beene freed from his insolent masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall verie shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleeved, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans paffing through their Countrie. They knew all advantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had alreadic passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farreaduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to 50 leaue behind: though both the getting, and the fauing, did cost many lines, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselues; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and fo to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to affilt him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthie Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was appropued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthie of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept Liu.l.28. from leading his Armie over TAVRVS, and adventuring upon the calamitie threatned by SYBYLS verses, unto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armic, that should passe ouer Tauras, I doe not conceive. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before hand wonne, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But wee finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neere about 20 one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had reference vnto the fame things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Agyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibylhad in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, Sowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take lib, a. root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the comming of our Sauiour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers have beene well pleased to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions I have sometimes thought reverend-20 ly: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But observation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed voon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon upon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether Exercises and free mee from mine errour; making it apparent, That not onely those prophecies of Annal. Barn. Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainely was foreshewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, 10.6 11. which have borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoeuer deuised them ) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as 40 delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthned with forceine proofes. And in the fame ranke, I thinke, wee ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus Euseb. Eccl. history that is, To Simon the boly God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene confectated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should bee misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rot-

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a 10 few of the richest, which ever the Citie beheld. Out of that which hee brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punicke warre. Solong was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memoric, of any danger. This Triumph of Manline was deterred by him, euen as long as hee well could: for that he thought it not fafe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Potteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that 20 fuch vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answere came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, hee told the People, That you the same day of the yeere hee had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre, by a fignall victory. In memory whereof, hee thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there give thankes to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at 30 other times, hee had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto hee inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ener fince the seventeenth yeere of his life, untill be now grew old, the honourable places by them conserved upon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deferts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still bee like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: fo as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, 40 vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: hee willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankefull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time hee spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any defire of fecing Rome againe. How many yeeres he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is uncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopamen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawne him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one 50 of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding ) had not caused them to delift. Howfoeuer it was the fame Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Assatique. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching monie received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should give charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and indicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of lingular industric; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde hee was even faultie: for though hee would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifulland vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Lawe did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyfoned with enuic, troubled both himselse and the whole Citie, whilest hee lined. His meane birth caused him to 10 hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant hee had been at Thermopyle, was his Competitor for the Cenforship, and likely to carrie it, hee tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no betterthan malicious periurie, That he had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the Campe of Antiochia. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipioes grew partly, (befides his generall spight at the Nobilitie) from his owne first rising, wherein hee was countenanced by Fabius Maximu, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given vnto 20 himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipie, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dishke of the Consuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainely told him, That he had no neede of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies hee published, or for want of judgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertuethat was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deedes consuted sufficiently the author of such salse tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipioes, whileft it was nourished by their enemie, brake out vpon advantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuere inquirie and 30 iudgement being appointed of purpole against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was seene condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should have beene layd vpin prison: but from this rigour of the Law hee was freed by Tiberius Gracebus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any figne of his having been beholding to Antrochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Saipio no whit the better. His kinred. friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would have set him in better 40 estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his necrest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vponthat great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreme danger. But these sactious contentions did no long while containe themselues within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Attosleading the multitude, in such quarressome businesse, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, afterward with swords; and sinally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonness was more commonly named Mother of the

Gracchi, faw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approued by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Confuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls prouide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to have woon a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracehus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by fuch authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was 10 fo condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the civill warres; which giving vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cefar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate hee was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Conful had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: fo the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces 20 in the House, did compell Casar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prenailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intefine discord the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subjects vnto the arbitrarie gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their infolent rule, wherein they tooke vponthem as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse. nor beleeved of her selfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. 30 Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequele will discouer.

CHAP. VI. The second Macedonian Warre.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with ANTIOCHVS was finished. The Romans quarrel with PHILIP. They deale in solently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being whreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne DEMETRIVS; of whom thencefoorth hee becomes icalous.

FTER the ouerthrow of Antischus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamas, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts : yet in verie 50 truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vasialls to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomfocuer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to referue (as the French call it ) le dermier resort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had affumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutelv. that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as every pettic injurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadours, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselues within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vtter-10 ly disfolued. Neuerthelesse it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magistrates so tree, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow verice gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more fenfibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein confisted their chiefe hope of thrining; or, as being more fearefull of difpleasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living 20 further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings; his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to vschis owne euen as he listed, untill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little availeable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations. by them not throughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deferts) were they very louing vnto Masanista, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion lettled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection vnto themselves, by the ministerie of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsefull 20 and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But fuch magnanimitie was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himfelfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus : yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie 40 and Thrace, hee was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Anus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demaunded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them hee had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselues.

These Townes of Anus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimechus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very farre. He is thought to have made himselse Lord of Transylvania: in which Prouince it is faid, * That innumerable Medals of gold have beene found, in the garie by Mart. age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped Fumee, lib. 5. with his Image on the one fide, on the other fide with Victorie. Of all these Lord-50 ships the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and flue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to find their advantages, and make vie of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting vp the waves, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lylimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of 10 his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate : yet for a smuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the A. tolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answere, That his Garrison did only saue it from the Thracians: who, as foone as hee thence withdrew his men, did feize voon the Towne. and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Anus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not awayled him, 20 in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; fince Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre, and since they, by their victorie had gotten vinto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Anus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonnesus, that were alreadie his by their gift. What they would determine, he might eafily perceiue, by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges betweene him and all that 30 made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in every controversie. Neperthelesse, he sent Embassadours to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes: wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his fide. For he had holpen their Confuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Atolians: wherein what soeuer he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes,lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By fuch allegations either hee was likely to prevaile, or at least wife to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what hee had to 40 doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadours. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their libertic, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sca-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such fort, as they might have little joy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might facke the Towne, and vseall cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadours, who had better notice, than could have beene 50 feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more frictly, than became his Majestie, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himselfe, and layed it even upon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadours to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who furnised, were either his owne friends for fo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durft not vtter an offenfine word. But he found the Romans more seuere, and more throughly informed in the bulinesse, than to rest contented with such an answere. He was plainely told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to bee examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet 10 he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should bee at their disposition: but concerning Onomassus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor necre to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to give away his friends. As for Caffander, because he should tell no tales; shee tooke order to have him poisoned by the way. By this we see, that the doctrine, which Machiauel raught vnto Cafar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to deftroy them when they have performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne invention. All ages have given vs examples of this goodly policie, the later having been eapt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient; as the reigne of Henry the eighth bere in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the 20 Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had denised, for the taking away of another mans life.

CHAP.6. S.1.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleafant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sonne Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answere to all complaints; and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that he had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacific the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himselse was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as having bee. 30 well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome : and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would bee borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to direct from himselse some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Judges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controversies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Acheans. It was objected vnto the Ache-40 ans, That they had committed a gricuous flaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedamon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lyeurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achaens, made answere, That these banished Lacedamonians who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to beethe men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Acheans having onely called those vnto iudgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes having slaine them, vpon private, though inft hatred, 50 as they were comming to make answere for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedemon, hee faid it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to desend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications; as the

Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lyourgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it itrange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to fee themselves thus constrained, to answere and give account of their actions; as vassals 16 and slaves vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Acheans as well require to bee satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busic themselues, to take account how things went at Lacedamon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertic of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselues to ratific it: then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yettaking state vpon him, he pronounced more like a Master than 20 a Judge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and carne thanks whileft they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appias. Yet Feare prevailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they lifted. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very so one after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Acheans vpon any Citizen of Lacedamon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedamon, should bee suffered to continue a 30 member of the Asham Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discoucred no lesse, as to them seemed, the lone which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had

Into fuch flaucrie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-weales whatfocuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselues; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and per- 40 swalions of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by feeking Patronage, made meere vaffals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so prevaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept 50 in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrie would be his, when soeuer he should take armes, as short-lie he was like to doc. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the delired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie foone following. Hee had beene louingly vied at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne fake, as they then faid and wrote into Mecedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at 10 the entreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a icalousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance; and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and 20 for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perfeus, the elder sonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should bee conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perfew, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his yonger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this icalousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memora-

ble accidents that were in the meane time.

CHAP. 6. S. 2.

He Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Acheans; that they feemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achean Common-wealth, having long beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselues from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, severed from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-firongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to secke occasion of reducing things to fuch passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee 50 drawne, and either fide fo farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopamen, then Prætor of the Achaans, levied fuch forces as hee could in hafte, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achaans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians, whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace; there arrived, by chance, a supplie of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopamen himselse had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of hiscourage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselves under his conduct. He tooke upon him to 10 make the Retrait : and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, didterrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being call to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to bee so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeved, that he was hardly thought to bein his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They 20 caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themsclues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune; and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the fingular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliueric. Contrarywise, Dinocrates and his Fa-Etion were defirous haftily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leave any diffrace, or iniuric, done to him, vnreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had beene made for the custodie of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine 20 laid an heavie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staied long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was fafe, when he heard an answere to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seventie yeeres old, and weakned with long ficknesse, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and casily tooke away his life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselues, for that they had beene more mindfull to preserve their owne lives, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent 40 a Commander. Whilest they were denising what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently affli-&cd: fo as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armic against Messer: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopamen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all 50 of them slaine at his funerall, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He would have entermedied in this busines of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doc.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not fo much to withdraw him from profecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightfull enemie in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condifcend: or rather (as Liuie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, atroupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to suto spect the faith of Prusias, had denised some secret sallies under ground to sauc himfelfe from any treasonable and sudden affault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constrayned to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to faue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands, who, as he well knew, would neither respect his samous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, he tooke the poylon into his hand, which he alwayes preferued for a fure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerse fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, hee vttered these wordes: I will now (faid he) deliver the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres 20 poffest them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIVS over me, which am difarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never bee numbred among the rest of his heroicall deedes : No : it shall make it manifest to all the N ations of the world, how farre the auncient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers; as, when PYRRH vs inuaded them in Italie and was readie to give them battaile at their owne dores, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson: whereas these of a later race have employed FLAMINIVS, aman who hath heretofore beene one of their Confuls, to practife with PRVSIAS, contrarie to the honout the King, contrarie to his Faith given, and con-trarie to the Lawes of Hospitalitie, to slaughter or deliver up his owne Ghest. He then cur-30 ling the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to revenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyfon, and died.

of the Historie of the World.

In this yeerealfo (as good Authors have reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainely, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we have now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might have commaunded such supplyes, as the Watre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was fo strongly cross by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did 40 lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and

CHAP. 6. S.2.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and jealousic of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more unprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and jealousie of men, the spoyles, rapes, samine, slaughter of the innocent, vaflation, and burnings, with a world of mileries layed on the labouring man, are fo hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monlue the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the mercies of GoD infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them per-50 mitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories. which are obtayned by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues have rayled them aboue the leucll of their inferiours, and have surmounted their enuie: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with difgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Liuius, L. Emylus, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Danid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine loab. With this fare Alexander teasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Etius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was strucken in the world; forthere fell of those that fought beside runne-awaies, an hundred and 10 fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Atius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Etius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Lius living. And besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atus, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissoluted then obscured. The same inworthy destinie or a farre worse, had Bellusarius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and he died a blinde begger. Navies also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Iustine. That Rule of Cato 20 against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to wir. That the Common-weale cannot bee accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and in deed a Turkish one, That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre. than fuffer his owneglory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajaret the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Viliers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonfalue, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinande Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines 30 of all Nations have been payd with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may bee faid, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue been given, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but have vsed the advantage of some 40 commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undescruedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in feeming, than in deed. Phosas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, feldome found in any other than cowards, hee flue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him again by Heraclius; who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Le- 50 onties laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his note and eares, and fent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whole charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Instine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the fame same fashion. Philippieus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Malter Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodolius; how many others have been repayed with their owne crueltic, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thoufands, hoping of Captaines to make themselues Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perified in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriuing, 10 by the practice of Armes, is to take what may bee gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of vnthanketulnesse in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: Alittle Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came Eccles. 9.14. against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore & 15. and wifeman therein, and hee delivered the Citie by his wifedome : but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, lest thereby

they should acknowledge themselves to have beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser fort of them thinke to sauour of some impotency in them-20 sclues. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused: which proves that weakenesse to be in them indeede, whereof they so gladly shunne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thankes; yet so, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines haue made, by enriching themselues with the spoile of the enemie, they are very inquilitiue to search into it, and to strip the wel-deservers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously torob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition : that even they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Sciptoes being so lately recited.

30 In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne fafetie she was constrained to vndertake, her Majettie had no lesse cause to vse the sernice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had, yet, according to the deftiny of that profession, I do not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldeft and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Majestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitic of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her daies never received dishonour, by the cowardife or infidelitie of any Commander, by her selfe chosen

40 For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Nerice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honor to our Nation ( for the meanes they had ) as ever any did: those (I say) with many other brave Collonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauaies and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Majestie in the advancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, hane beene subject, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are neerest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnific a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deseruing, and of far greater vie than them felues.

But his Maiestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honored more Martial men, 10 than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath given a Corones to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkcable scruice, as well in the yeere 1 588, as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Seas; having first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maicstie hath changed the Baronies of Montion and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

PHILIP making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subsects. His negotiation with the Bastarna. His crueltie. He suspecteth his some DEMETRIVS. DEMETRIVS accused by his brother PER-SBVS; and shortly after saine, by his fathers appointment. PHI-LIP repenteth bim of his (onnes death; whom he findeth to have beene innocent: and intending to revenge it on PERSEVS, he dieth.

VINTUS MARTIVS the Roman Embassador, who travailed up and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had recei-Qued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that hee might not seeme to have discoucred nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done what soeuer they enjoyned him; yet so, as it might appeare, that fuch his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. Hee added further, That all the doings and fayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnes to the Romans, 40 and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conucnient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes soeuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would adventure to take his part : yet hee provided as well as hee could deuise, against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remoued them all 50 into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, bee denised vpon alluring the Bastarna, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river

Снар.б. $.3. of Danubius, to abandon their feat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrivall, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, when soeuer they found aduantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Baflarna, by hope of spoile, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expediti-10 on, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them upon the way: Ratherit was thought, that the Scordifei, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarne from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; along and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wines and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to ftrengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Ro-20 mans, nor were knowne vnto them; fince he was not like to finde assistance from anie civill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarna came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in fome small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and

flood worst affected toward him. But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake 30 their ancient dwellings, and betake themselues to such new habitations, as hee in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the changes Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise then by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did vnwillingly, being himselse ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparent. This cuill therefore would soone haue been determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just forrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly fought reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none 40 of them deservedly. This encreased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injuried, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should have massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragicall then perhaps he could have desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengcance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like milerie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings yonger sonne. It may 50 well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish diffention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this yong Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme

life, the fallion of their apparell, or the vnfightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jefted at in ordinarie discourse and table-talke. Demetring was fure to be presently on fire, defending and prayling them, even in fuch points as rather needed excuse. This, and his dayly conversation with their Embassadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should sep betweene him and the succession, converted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perfew was then thirty yeeres old; of astirring spirit, though much desective in valour. Demetrius was yonger by five 10 veeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discoucred. The jealous head of the King having entertained fuch fuspitions, that were much increafed by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great folemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They eleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then fol- 20 lowed the King between his two fonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts: which, under the Kings two fonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vfing poles, and the like, in Read of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skir milh there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly secke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recovled. Perfeus himselfe was fore for this, as it had been some bad pre- 30 fage: but his friends were glad, and though, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier fort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they faid, that this victory of Demetrius would affoord matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemne passime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indiscreetly, that hee was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After some store 40 of wine. Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his traine behinde, but forced them also to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perfeus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if he stood in feare to be affaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and faered very angerly with his brother. But Perfeus, bidding him be gone as an enemie, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertaine- 50 ment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the fame that hath been here recited, faue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggrauate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans: by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perfeus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was forie to fee him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him; as alfothat they fought how to winne vnto Demetries the love of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, fent of late from T. Quintius to the King himfelfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius 10 to Rome; and that he should yet further doc well to fend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegeance of those, that should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their ducties to their old King, become feruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answere, by rehearfing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as hee remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perfess, that connected matters of Passime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; Hee faid that it 20 grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wife from their opinion thereof: fo as by any impious practice, Hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not fuch passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a icalous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excesse or error, whatfocuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter. but vpon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themsclues both in word and deed. And herein hee may seeme to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward, hee gave himselfe over wholly 30 to Per/eus: vling so little conference with his yonger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. Aboue all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrels betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they faw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose scale they had counterfetted) vnto the King. The contents wherof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of 4c granting it. That his youthfull and ambitious defires had caused him to enter into practices vniuttifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should never take effect. for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pittied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his fecret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in fafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reversion vnto the 50 Crowne of Macedon. What soener his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the falfhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolued to put his sonne to death, without surther expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away privily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accurfed Minister of his Kings vnaduised sentence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secrety, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Russians, to finish the tragedic: who villanously accomplished their worke by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antisonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houses of Lysimachus and 10 Cassander fell either with themselves, or even vpontheir heeles; by intestine discord and icalousies, grounded on desire of sourraigne rule, or scare of losing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptolemic and of Seleneus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinarie note, how that voftart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raifed it felfe to maruellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples: but is faid to have propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne 20 for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But Hee was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindely affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the fatiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite he delightfully had committed upon mamy innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poylon. After the death of his some, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin 20 objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him fatisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not beene contriner of the whole processe. His only remaining Son Perfew could so ill dissemble the pleasure which here tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might cafily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leffe to be feared than at other times, when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, lest off his viuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well understood the difference, be- 40 tweene arising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner defolate, fome expecting his death; and fome scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had never beene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Coulin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perfeus: and thus becomming subject vnto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsailour, when he found that the anger conceined against Perfeus would not vent it selfe, and give 50 case to the King, vitill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason obiected; as also that Philodes and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the busines: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing hee found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying that this tellow knew all, and must therefore bee made to veter what hee knew. Xyehus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himfelfe, that hee had beene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when hee vinderstood, that by the vinaturall practice of one fon, he had so wretchedly call away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly against himselfe, and 10 with a against the authors of the mischiefe. V pon the first newes of this discourrie. Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken; and either for a fmuch as hee could not deny it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty, or elfe was put to torture. Perfess was now growne stronger, than that hee should neede to flie the Countrie: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him. and confer it vpon Antigonius. But his weake body, and excessive griefe of minde. fo disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his pur-20 pose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had raigned about two and forty yeeres: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe. with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerfe condition: fince his vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate delires, if hee had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof he 30 little cared to performe the dutie. His death, even whilest yet it was only drawing necre, was forefignified vnto Perfeus, by Calligenes the Phylician; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the fuddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine he no leffe improvidently loft, than he had wickedly gotten.

How the Bastarna fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseys in the beginning of his Reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Masanissa, cruelly to oppresse the Carthaginians. They quarress with Perseys. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callic Rates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseys. Hee seeks friendship of the Acheans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

Mmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Baflarne into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free paffage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly observed, as long as none other was knownethan that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or suffained, for his feruice. But when it was heard, that a new King raigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dasht and confounded. The Thrasians would no longer afford fo good markets vnto the se strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarna would not be contented with reason, but became their owne carners. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriuing in the present, with little regard of right or wrong. Within awhile they fell to blowes; and the Baffarne had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vie of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, received by them in affaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirtie thousand, which pierced on 10 into Dardania. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the carelesse vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselues: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions back into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroylehimselsein a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore hee wholly gaue his minde to the fettling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, either for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; he 20 fate personally to heare their causes in judgement (though herein hee was so ouerdiligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of inflice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, he had care to avoide all necessitie of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to fend Embassadors thither, to renue the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in feeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours : but was rather herein so excessinely bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became fogriping and tenacious. His teare was indeed the mastring passion, which ouer- 20 ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discernewhich of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requifite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busic in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as ever fince the victory) a heavy hand : and suffered Masanifia to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, wereafraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they 40 were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Mafanissa therefore had great aduantage over them: and was not ignorant how to vicit. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated.

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did hee vie them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had any; otherwise, without it. Galathe Father of Masanisa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, 50 and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all maner of submissiue obedience to Rome.

They had scarcely digested his injury, when Masanissa came upon them againe, and tooke from them aboue seventic townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how gricuously they were oppressed by reason of two articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their own lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masanissa, inuading their Country, howfocuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare desensive armes against him, but suffered them-10 felues to be caten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherfore they entreated, that either they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their owne by firong hand; or at leaft, if right must wholly give place to favor, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Majanista should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then defired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended fince the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchfale to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to line in seare, and none otherwise draw 20 breath than at the mercie of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embaffadours threw themselues prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion. Here may wee behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irrefolution, in profecuting a war fo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfe penny worthing, in matter of expence. when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they feruants, even to the feruants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slaine, taken, and sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africke and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno fo often and so earnestly defired. Onely they want peace with Ma-30 Janissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might have beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canna; then Hannibal that wanne it was vsed by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompence: as alfothey had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to fet out an armie into Spaine, at what time the enemie lay under their owne wals. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and there-40 fore the Carthaginians having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pittifull behaviour bred peraduenture some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to have beene mistrusted, as proceeding no leffe from envie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparifons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no fuch leave as they fought, of defending their owneright by armes: but contrariwife, when without leave obtained they prefumed fo far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answere; though they had o-50 therwise little amends. Gulussathe sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made the Carth iginians against his Father. Hee answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell divers nights, in the Temple of Asculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be our much trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant taith to the People of Rome. This answere gaue little fatisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, what focuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their inflice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the conenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely 10 to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly prefents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father. that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of viging them vinleasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for searc, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Ma/aniffa, in way of thankfulneffe; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished; hee made none other ac- 20 count, than that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not beene vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obferuc his behausour. These Hee entertaind kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no leffe ill contented with good offices, by him done to fundry of his neighbours, than with those 30 wrongs, which they faid (that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called fuch his bounty, feeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flue Euphranor, whom he had appointed their governour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to have presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had beene extremely prouoked; or elfe were secretly animated by the Romans. What socuer it was that bred this courage in them: Per/eus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angerly this pre- 40 sumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; wherto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Majanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine have reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall 50 termes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, when socuer they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraor-dinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have challifed the Messensans by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke voon them to carry any butinesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuerthelesse, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were to not like to thrine; especially in viurping the practice of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citic. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Polyb.legon. 51; schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharp correction. Yet was 633. there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Malters. For the Roman Senate, being defirous to humble the Acheans; refused not onely to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweeve them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, rejected this honest and reafonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argines, Lacedamonians, or Co-20 rinthians, would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a bustnesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not spheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had veterly subdued the Messemans far sooner than was expected; and when as not onely no Towne rebelled from the Acheans, but many entred into their corporation : then did the Romans with an ill-fauored grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made fuch bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus 30 thinking, by a fained grauitic, to have served their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to fet on the weaker, against the stronger and more sufpected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like complishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman arts how soeuer many (forgainfull or timerous respects) would seeme to vinderstand them; yet were 40 generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Onely the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, having neither subjects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practife their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Muthridates : being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that 50 with ouer-nice diligence strone to preserue their liberties and lands, from consumanner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers;

without interpoling the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnleffe peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the ac-

ming by piece-meale: they were to be denoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to have affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neither

Снар.6. $.4.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time flood affected. Perfew, by realon of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long fince foretold; of the miserable lubiection, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, selt themselves grieved with the present subjection, wherto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had to the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect. bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone bee at an end; when honestic and love of the Commonweale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull provifion for the fafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertifed: eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom every Citic in Greece had too many) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore 20 more like to speake maliciously than truely; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne defires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to fend Embaffadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesses chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the 30 plaine fort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselues into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore inflead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in instification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the fettling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of 40 confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it, that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by sorce of some Law, they were discharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be fo, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes or Monuments creeted, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratissie the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to give 50 eare vnto such perswasions. For howsocuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, feeming neuer fo bad, were fure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would in-increase apace, and they became the prevalent saction. It was therfore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiefty. More wifely, though with feditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or delert; onely for having vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were ob-Itinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolued to sollow this good counsaile, in enery point; yearo depresse all those that held with 10 the right, and to set up their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to Polyb, Legat, 58, this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had bin their maner in former times, but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to fee that their mandate (which was concerning the reftitution of those that were banished out of Lacedamon) should bee sulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callierates; they aduised all men, to be such, and so affected, as hee was, in their seueral common-weales. With this dispatch, Callier ates returned home a joyfull man: hauing brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himfelfeinto the way of preferment. Neuerthelesse he forbore to vant himselfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely he so reported his Embassage, that all men became searc-20 full of the danger, wherewith hee threatned those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his ready obsequiousnes unto those whom he had made his Patrons. Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perfeus on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promiles, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with tactions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates, where-30 in they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought itan indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherofif not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perfew having finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armic along with him; yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wife, that no place was the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased therby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the 40 memory of al wrongs whatfocuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father; fince his own meaning was to hold friendship fincerely with all his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselse after a contrary falhion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a journey, without their licence, this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Acheans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For how soeuer

Philip had by many vileacts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them 50 cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not wishout much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to for sake him. Wherfore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vie al circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him to doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of warre, and when all danger of innovation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving meanes of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like fort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduenture thither, none of them durst set soot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ran daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profi- 10 table vie. But Per/eus took hold vpon this occasion: as fitly scruing to pacific those, whose enmitie faine he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Acheans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their servants; so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindely accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callier ates tooke the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke vpon him, 20 somewhat liberally, to make the Achaans before-hand acquainted with the warre, that was comming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Per/eus had, fince his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly He rehearled all those mattets, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the invalion of the Ballarne. vpon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he faid) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he adulfed them, to expect the euent of things. and not ouer-halfily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. 30 Hereto good answere was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renued his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Acheans, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheleffe Callicrates was growne a man fo terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto fur- 40 ther deliberation: and answere made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without any Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it wasto say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perfew, herewith not contented, would needs vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, & deny to give audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could understand ) of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was given.

V M ENES King of Pergamus had been troubled, about the settines, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. He had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was an impated with some formal. whom he was an imated with comfortable words, and promife, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesses, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselse; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions 20 as pleased him to give them. After this being at good leifure; hee began to confider, how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perfeus. His hatred to Perfeus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romens, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hæreditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greeker, prodigal in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax every where stale: whilest Perfeus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so 30 violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore and indirect courses of revenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from seuere and cruell chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This ren 'ed him contemptible: as likewife, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his Folyb.Legat. 74. honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achaans, as too vnmcasured, misbeleeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his descruings. All this which he needed not to have regarded, had he not beene too vainely ambiti- Liuis lib. 42. ous) befellhim, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romans, and for his 40 malice to that noble Kingdome, which it it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to fland. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to strine any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therfore he resolued euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all fo vainely worthipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for fetting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like service,

50 when Antiochus was vanquished. To this end, he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to fay which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarna into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphis, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in bulinesse of neighbours; his riches; and his great prouisions: were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, hauing fearched into all (as hee professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee faid, That Perfess had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his owner money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand mercinaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, readie, at a call, to bring him foldiours as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driven, either to live yeon to spoile, or to take from his owne subjects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to confider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Landice in marriage to Perfeus; Perfeus not wooing but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the fifter of Perfeus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainely) That even the envie of their Estate was the cause. why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Persens, which might either bee denied, or instified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who inuaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; fince it would bee to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger. It were too great folly, to beleeue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set upon them in italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make warre without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their affociates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were given to Eumenes, who had 30 euery way firmished them with such goodly colour, to beautific their intendment. Now though it were so, that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpontales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitic against them; their injustice, and oppression, would have beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and 40 securitie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then viuall curiofitie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embasfadors were at Rome, provided of answeres to the words, which they knew beforehand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all menknew, made a notable shew of fome fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooved their wisedome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian -50 Embassadours; who accused Eumenes as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer been, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conneighed by Sea vnto Perfews, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted.

cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as alreadie vanquished, were fettling Polyb. Legat. themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadours came from Rome with strange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it flood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them affigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere valials, but as dependants and affociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victoric against King Antiochus, Hereat Eumenes, Masanilla, The Etolians, 13 and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find themselves agricued if they well considered the matter: fince by force of this or the like decree, these their subjects might easily be made their fellowes, when soeuer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the prefent meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perfeus, by fetting them and the Lycians together by the cares. The Fathers could therfore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadours; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more; for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his love to

of the Historie of the World.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessely as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Per/eus defired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might sauour of hostilitie: but that, if his traugile in this kind proved vaine, then would be be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falles out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from 30 instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman scruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps veterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weakenesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassadour for him, was bold to fet a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to Fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to vie it.

40 Now that this braueric (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe facrifice to Apollo. Per seus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his bloud, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a facrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischieuous enemie. So there were appointed three or foure flour ruffians to do the murder: who placing themfelues behind a broken mud wall, on the fide of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence affault the King; whom they forely bruited so with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, see in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Emmenes was conveighed away to the little Isle of A-gina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the same of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as king, and either took or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of flate ) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that Hee should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, untill Hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise At. 10 talus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especial) fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus rayled and veheld: as might also that of Macedon have beene, if Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of

It is likely that Perfeus was very glad when he understood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had faued all from discouerie. But as hee was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lined: so was He 20 beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which hee vainly effected the lesse materiall. For He had written to one Praxoa Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he fent about this busines: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light . Velerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous fecret; bad prefently fought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundusum was the ordinary Port, for ships paffing betweene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadours, and other honoura- 30 ble personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iournying to and fro. By occasion of fuch his hospitalitic, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or defired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The fumme of all was. That he must needs doe a turne, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poylon of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, 40 and one whom the King had neuer scene before, nor was like to see againe; and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a sellowes affirmation, the accusatio was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like fort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to bee made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulneffe of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subject pleading for his life in judgment. But howfocuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might have bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perfeus was very futeable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand 50 to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held in excusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for fuch private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to bave offended in the nature of a King. Herein furely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not fend men to waste the Kingdom of Pergamu, or to beliege the Towns: might he fend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leffe breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poylon? Wherefore they prefently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadours to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemes at this time to have been so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he defired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by 10 fhew of courage, to make his enemies the more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him; adding therto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their maner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have flood vpon the evidence, brought against him by Rummius and Praxe. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to 20 build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to bee firong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perfeus answered, for the present in a rage: calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Infolent, & vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, hee promised to give them in writing their ful answere: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by him-

selfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduife, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is fet downe Polyb, Legal. 4. by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience 30 in the future; excepting those which he immediatly performed. But Liuie inserts Liu.ib.330 a clause, whereby hee was expresly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby enery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that hee could no more make warre abroad, than if hee had been restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that feeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romanes would vrge this point further, and fav, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very just reason to finde himselfe agrieued.

40 For fince they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whileft they themselues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargaine after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By such allegations hee maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniust, hee ministred occasion vnto the Embassadours, to give him desiance. Having heard the worst of their message; hee commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should have been lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his

50 heart could ferue him to vndertake the warre; hee should couragiously haue managed it, and have fallen to worke immediatly, whilest the Enemie was vnprepared, not have lost opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The flattering Alabanders.

O long had the Romans beene feeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde-hand in provisions. But it was on a fudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences 20 to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together feemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleeue, that their owne strength was such as would prevaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, 30 and take part with the Macedonian: such was the diffension betweene their several estates; howsoener the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheleffe Embaffadours were fent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perfeus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had flood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with fuch Roman courtesie: and vnderstood, that not onely fuch as made refusall, but even they who might seeme to have granted balfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse 40 was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; * the Achaens and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duetic. It is firange, that men could bee so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have feene the ruine. The vulgar fort was enery where addicted to Perfeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perfeus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one : who so though Hee * indged the victoric of Perseus, like to prooue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romanes ill to thrine, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall bee shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, ture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and folliciting all to joyne with him. But wife men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all meanes of pacification; and to that end, made humble fuit vnto the Roman Embaffadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was viuall among the Romans, made flew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martins very gently rebuke the King, and 20 charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perfew made none other answer; than the same which they could have made for him; ver the Embassadors, and especially Martin, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to give the like fatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martin his desire; which was to make the King lofe time. For Perfeus had all things then in readines. and might have done much ere the Roman army could have been in Greece, But by the interpolition of this truce, he no way increased his forces, he suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elfe, than leifure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleafed herewith, as it 30 had bin with some victory: publishing a copic of the disputation between him and the Ramans, whereby he gaue men to vinderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He fent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intrest them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators; to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne fafety being the vimoft of his ambition. This his fearefulnes might seeme excusable, and the blame therof to ap-40 pertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their own had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to give fuch a manly beginning to the war, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many flout partizans, defired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Baotians also, who had entred of late into a Strict focietie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further in a fort, they yeelded the felues as vassals. Neither was their feuerall townes to make covenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common weales they might not (were they never fo desirous to rebell) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citic of Thebes. This work, of separating the Baotians that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reverence of the Imperiall Cit e, made the Acheans and other Effaces of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occalion of this their feare, may be inftly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of not only to his own Kingdom, but vinto all that were oppressed by the Romans, Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning fornewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that every small thing would ferue to terrific him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans

vpon those which had affifted him: little cause was there, why any should aduen-

10 power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leifure

Martins brought this to effect, whileft the King late fill, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Cities where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprodued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as hee should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perfeus had sent, audience 10 was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded : but neither excuse, nor intreatic, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolued before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citic, and had thirty dayes respite allowed them to depart out of Italy : whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the viuall place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to fuch Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of cleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtefie serve alone to hide the craft of Martins, as if hee had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keepe a long while 20 from Perfeus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee thould need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Conful, was at Apollonia. in a maner as foone, as the Macedonian Embaffadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have rouzed Perfeus, and have made him lay afide all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer him felfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enioy the reft; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the floutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wifest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly 30 and wifely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne until now, to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall facrifice, with an hundred beafts, to I know not what Minerna, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers. and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found confisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and source thousand horse: whereof about twelve thoufand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches: laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the 40 goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemic, especially in numbers. They answered him cheercfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks : but answered. That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to surnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he iffued forth into Theffalie: knowing that the Romans were to paffe through that Countrey, in their journey towardshim. Some Townes of Theffalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend 50 themsclues; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Myla; atown thought impregnable, and therefore, not more floutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the affailants. It was taken by reason of a fally, which the Townelmen rathly made, and being driven backe, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practifed heere: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Velatia and Connus (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Offs, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne feated on the foot of mount Offa; where hee refled a while expecting newes of the Enemie.

CHAP. 5. S. 6.

Licinius the Conful brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promifed other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes, and Atta-10 la his brother came to him in Theffalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aide as the severall Eflates could afford, or thought expedient to fend: which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Majaniffa fent thither his fonne Mifagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephanes. Arrarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had fent to Rome his yong fonne, there to bee brought up: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within awhile, but when it was too late, to be otherwise adulsed than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was contentto be a looker on : as being allied to Perseus, and yet fea-20 ring the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then yong, and under Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie tricke, wherewith M. Lucreties, the Roman Admirals brother, ferued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie shippes, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose : all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind fort; making fliew to believe. That for none other ende than to ferue the Remans, their good friend Gentius had fent thither this fleet. But what soener Gentius thought in 30 the beginning; hee fooliinly loft both his kingdome and himfelfe, in the ende of this warre; by offering, rather then giving, his helpe to Perfeus. With none other company than what hee brought ouer the fea. Licinius came into The (falie: fo tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perfeus had beene ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs have taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armic, by the nucr Feneus, where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was notany slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perfeus. Therefore he resolued, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers 40 were sufficiently increased : contenting himselfe in the meane while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of The falie, in which the fe two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece belides : as has uing beene freed by them from a more heavie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of fuch a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midft of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly ful of all delights, that the name was often vied at large, to fignific the most pleafant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Offa and Olympus (famous in Poelie) with their Spurres or branto ches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie.

And this way were the Romans to enter into Micedon; vnleffe they would make an hungric journey, thorow the countrey of the Daffaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doc. Perfens therefore had no small advantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might have had, if by miffpending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worle; yea to winne vpon them ( for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation : questionlesse he might have done far greaterthings, had hee feized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinde the Mountaines of Produs. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans have either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else have committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would have sought other way 10 into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be faid, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would have made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Atolians, voon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as soone as they met with Per (eus. The Bastians, how politikely focuer Martins had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonians quarrell: what would they have done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to waner, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to for sake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, fince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a searcfull companie running from their enemies, till some river stay their slight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would have wonne the victorie: fo fell it out with Perfess. In feeking to avoid the danger of that war, whereof hee should have sought the honour; hee left his friends that would have flood by him, and gaue them cause to provide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to bee driven into such miserie, as was ineuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theffalse, it is hard to shew 40 particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Conful bauing no desire to fight, untill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Laris. That which perswaded the Consulto protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a basty triall. Wherefore hee invited the Romans into the field; by washing the land of the Phereaus their consederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to adventure even unto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee safely lodged. They sentout a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed soot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eu-

mucs, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thusday after day, awhile together, Perfeus continued offring battaile : which they fill refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these branadoes. The towne of Sycurium, where Perfeus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romanes: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which vscd to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirstie when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconucniences, he found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the enemie: whom he visited the next day by the Sunnerifing. His comming at fuch an vnufuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to affaile the trenches, yet the Consull thought it necessary, and resolued to give checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent foorth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Theffalians made a good retrait) with little loffe 20 of his owne. But he discouered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counfaile given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great teare left he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnsent for: he neuerthelesse tooke it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victoric; by which meanes it was faid, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwife many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue been the more, and the bol-30 der. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in fuing for it, euen when he had the victory, what elfe did he, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yeelding to the Romans, when socuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had flaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their toot he had flame about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and seare: it being much doubted that the enemie would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remoone to a surer place beyond 40 the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he flood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loffe past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to drawe vpon himfelfe a greater calamitie. So he paffed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Atolians were forely blamed for this losse: auf rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Fine of them, that were men of especiall marke, had been observed to be the first which turned their backes: an observation likely to cost them dearc, at a time of better leifure. As for the Theffel ans, their vertue was honoured with reward: fo as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, 50 that if they should shunne indignation, or incurre savour, then must they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Conful and his armie. Perfeus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, hee not untill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of fafety; whither they could never haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have rowted them. whilest they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have been done, fince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rame; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors. Confuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves overcome. With fuch braue words did the King fet out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles 10 among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came necrer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopfelius, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuerthelesse hee was easily perswaded to vie the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Conful, and offered to yeeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his father had beene bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Conful no greater power than to granta truce, whileft Embaffadours might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the 20 conditions, and ratific the league. And of fuch a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no smal discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answere, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be so resolute in adversitie. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answere so peremptory, hee still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much defired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemie did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of 30 Masanissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betweene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged over all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doc some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, hee failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers, he had a good hand vpon them, if he could have withdrawne it, and given over in time. But whileft he strong to force a guard, he was vifited by the Conful; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misaduenture, whether great 40 or small, caused Persew, after a few daies , to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally given to feare danger, even where none was; whereby what loffe he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, faue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and confequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too bard, he returned backe upon the Perrhabians and others; from whom he wanne some townes, and among the rest, Larissa. There were fundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consultooke, may seeme not to have belonged vnto the Thessalians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Per- 50 leus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Bastians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrific, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauic on their coalt. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other pettie townes, which by that fame diffraction of the Baotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to have beene lought among the changes happening in their variable factions: wherof the knowledge is now lott. Some of the m rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got fo much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like fort, if by extreme oppression hee 10 could have driven them fo farre. Neither was Licinius the Conful vidiligent in the fame kinde. What his doings were after fuch time as he was at leifure from Perfem, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is faid in generall; That in the warre which he made he * cruelly and couetoufly demeaned himfelfe.

After the same falhion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hostilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius the wed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in profecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Conful had fought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perfeus seemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed * polyb, Legat, 20 on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent 70. thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leavies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken V/cana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made thew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger: falled foorth voon him, overthrew him, and chased him fo farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Vscana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recoursed it and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one fide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, revolted from the Romans, on 20 the other. Perfeus likewise made a painefull journey into Ætolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian war under Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors trauelling thorowall the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to advance their bulines, than of those which 40 were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in Polyb.Legat.74. the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopamen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achean horse, but more notable by that excellent historic which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But fince no colour of truth could bee found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it so were well. In like manner dealt they among the Atolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approoned the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect.

was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all

donian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Gressan in Greece. On the contrary fide, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such fort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of acculations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselues, as men that could beleeue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should bee free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesseit were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. 10 Of this decree the whole countrie was glad: for it was, or feemed, a good remedie of many inconveniences. But they that standing on priviledge hereof, refused to fulfill every commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, prooued little better, if not worle, than to haue been Traytours. The Senate was driven to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great summe of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to have their subjects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to 20

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seeke redresse of iniuries, or to offer their services: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the leffer Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemenstargets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon lupiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuer farie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that 20 Goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, divine honours; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddesse, and receiving (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. MARTIVS the Roman Conful, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Persevs in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by MARTIVS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in bardestate. MARTIVS a cunning and a badman. POLYBIVS Cent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Achans. POLY-BIVS his honest wisdome beneficiall to the Achaans. King EVMENES growes averse from the Romans. PERSEVS negotiates with ANTIOCHYS and EVMENES. His false dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee drawes into the Roman warre, He fends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainely take upon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romans. PERSEV slofeth a mightie fuccour of the Bastarna, by his wretched parsimonie.

Fier two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greee, than when the warre began, which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Remarked Street, and it is the Remarked Street, and it is the Remarked Street, and it is the street. the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had

20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian lide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew fuch, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many towns, eue of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Komsas fide; and the armie much leffened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Conful himselfe (for they laid the blame one

20 vpon the other) in licencing the fouldiers to depart Quintus Martius the new Conful, who fucceeded vnto Hollelius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleffe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to fet the warre on foot, which a long time had flept. And he began the right way: not feeking to force the fireights that were furely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approch; and being uncertaine what way he meant to take, diffributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit afcent. But the Conful proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discoursed by

40 the Enemie, or to breake through all opposition, or at least wife, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in overcomming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemie, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe pecce of ground; and fent backe word to the Conful, where they were; intreating him to haften vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit difmayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bic-

50 kering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed; all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards; yet a shame to ceturne. Wherefore Martins tooke the onely course remaining, and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whileft be, with the reft. fetcht a compaffe about, and fought out wayes that never had beene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie : which notwithstanding he ouercame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeyes, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might seeme to have intended, that none should be. So steepe he found the discent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of seuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one over another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the gid- 10 die prospect, and casting their governours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, source miles of this grieuous journey; there was nothing more defired by the fouldiours, then that they might be suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges. like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other fultained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. V pon these two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher & the lower fall fo as the end of one 20 bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with plankes and turfe; that they might feeme continent with the ground; fo to make the beafts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretic way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut afunder; therby caufing him to fincke down vnto the next bridge; whence he was conucyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still, to the very bottome. Thus went they downe fliding, some on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an even valley. By this it appeares, how throughly provided the Romans vsed to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasi- 30 ons : as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conuevance of themselues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should have overtaken them, it the Enemie had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the first faue that custome, and the nearenesse to their wayes end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: fince they fought with his men upon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might welneare haue heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he 40 neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Conful, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the cuent. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the fame which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it : the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whofocuer would feeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martins had vndergone. The entrance by Diam was fairer then any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, faue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the 50 foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the river Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke up the one hall fe; the rest being such as might easily have beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middest of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublefome journey: if Perfeus could have feene his owne advantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable translibut must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the fame way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemes a mat-10 ter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from aboue their heads, would have beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bin inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no meanes to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsaile by them followed, as wife. For he no fooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then he

20 fared like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea : as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as wel as he could: though soone after, his mafter grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronieus, who had charge to fet fire on the Kings Arfenall, deferred the execution, foreseeing that repentance

30 might follow: and so he prevented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same fort: that so there might be no witnes of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are privie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perfeus would have gone furely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must be foroyally have behaved himselfe, that no man might beleeve him to 40 be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consulon the top of the mountaine) and Afelepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed the rated them openly; faying, that they had betraied unto the Enemiethe gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have fped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the 50 Roman armie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to substit, for want of victuals, He tooke Dium without refistance; & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes journey, and gotten one towne that yeeled, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, toreturne backe towards Theffalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to have holpen him Rrrrrr 2

748 in the war: but having left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carciull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were for saken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might come be brought into the army. To meet the feoner with this corne, which was desirously expected; he for sooke Diam, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse then foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines; for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly prouided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemic, he should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was:men 10 thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martins; the King recollected himselfe; understood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the rown of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done; he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemics proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would baue bin enough, not onely to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to have given him such a noble victory, as might 20 cause the Romans to seeke a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, & not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recouery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heraclea, standing on the river of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the maner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it sould; and was not given vp for feare. After this Martius did fet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it againe, and have driven the King further off :, though his intent or hope was nothing like fo great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He fent the Admirall to 30 make attempt vpon the sea-townes, The salonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were affayed but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted and some companies, that sundrie times adventured forth of the towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, cither by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherfore the Admiral fetting faile from thence, ranne along by Aniz, and Antigonea, (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes iouned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre; and fine other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his 40 fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus. before the town: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thece, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled vp with that earth, and concred with one single row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the wals. To this worke he appointed such as hee thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other side of the town, therby to shadow his attempt, the breach was foon made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for ioy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; & falying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the com- 50 panies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they flew about fix hundred & fuffred few to escape vnwouded. This disaster, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes affailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with fuch forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Towne, if the Admirall had laved fiege to it, but to keepe the land about it from fpoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemie pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphraner had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Melibera; whether the Conful (that he might not be quite without worke) had fent his Lieutenant to beliege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer fince their Conful (whether dastardly, or carelesty) most vnlike a good Commander had let goe his hold of Macedon, by for faking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agespolis their PolybiLeget, 80: Embassador, who came to him at Heracles about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniccture, that 20 this was rather a malicious denice of Martins, craftily feeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; then that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an army on foot: yet lince he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that fomewhat had bappened, which might make his feare sceme not counterfeit. And fo were the Rhodians moved to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtetic, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassador, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause its but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perfeus, & of Gentius the Illyrian did fet out their buline fle at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good

30 fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wher in he had lately flaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we find inti- Polyp Legat. 87: m ated: though the time place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men; &, for those few that he had, wanting both mony and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwife, he was in extreame danger, so as either he must quickly be fent for thence, or a new army be fent thither to him. Wherefore it may feeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at left, fome of the Townes which they belieged.

40 that the Romans with greater loffe, than is before spoken of, had been driven from

Now although it were fo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himfelfe like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or finister kind of wisdome, he dealt as a crastcomaster, with a restlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiencie, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neverthelesse, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perfess, by the successe of his doings against Hostilius, had got-50 ten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Theffalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of advertitie, whom in professive they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed. That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the komans in all danger. So the armic was leuied; and Polybius, with others, fent Embaffadors vnto Martius, to certifie him therof, and know his pleafure. Polybimy found the Conful busied in seeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Confuls leifure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time convenient, hee presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein socuer it should be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but faid, that he needed now no maner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signific thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius defired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, fine thousand men, to 10 be fent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable service, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labarynthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom hee declared, that Appius had no need of fuch aide; and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wife take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans bee put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing and vnable to resolue, whether it were for love to the Acheans, that the Conful was so carnest in this busines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, fince himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching 20 this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne felfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Conful, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other fide, that the words by Martius vttered to him in privat, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, valesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conful: by whom it was 30 fure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were fauers, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martins, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to fland in feare, left the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouersway al other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precifely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that 40 Eumenes did not so much as give any helpe to Martius: but comming to have ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in fuch anger, that herefuled to leave behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requested to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conful, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing care to Perfeus his defire of accord, for meere defire of gaine. And it might well bee, that conetou neffe drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. How- 50 socuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and sound him so tractable, that he was bold to folicite him by an Embaffage. The tenour of his advertifements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings.

CHAP. 6. $.7. though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and yied the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perfeus affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusies. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Alicedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Alia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prufice, than of him. In like fort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Agyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them. either to to compell the Romans, to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with fuch remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answere; hee began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no leffe weary, than Perleus was atraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might have fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condifcend vnto peace: 20 and for affurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perfeus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace : whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified.

money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, how socuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes hee would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did 30 no more, than loole time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a

The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the

After the same manner dealt Person with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and faid, That without money he could not ftirre. Hercunto Perfew loued, not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliver him from all his seares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perfeus; to the end that all to his armie might have comfort, by fuch accesse of strength to their partie. Prefently voon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perfeus and Gentius: who delired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perleus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Conful was no leffe defirous of peace than the Mucedonian, arrogantly promifed, that they, by their authoritie, would make peace: wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing prowd words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodiar's was throughly chastised; and more throughly should to have beene, if their submission had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud.

Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perfeus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus, the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprous ded. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon tenne Talents were fent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the yong King, as carnelt of that which followed. More followed indeed; and lealed vp with the feale of the Myrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treafure-bearers, and lent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto,

Liu.lib.44. Plutarch, in vit, Amjl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Cloudicus a pettie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarna. These had before hand made their bargaine, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entric into the Kingdome, Perfeus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give the souldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the meffenger had not what to answere. Why then (laid Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gaules will not stirre one foot 20 further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perfeus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an innectine against the incivilitie and avarice of the Bastarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fine thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vie; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if anic of his counsailors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, fince without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselues with spoile, 30 they should make the Romans glad to for sake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable feruice, whether they wonne anie victorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might have been ealledged, if anie man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was fent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thoufands that had beene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondieus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fine thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarna retur- 40 ned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbours parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perfeus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Emylius Paulus the new Conful: who in fifteene dayes after his fetting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which Goo had appointed ouer it a King fo foolish and so cowardly.

Y the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie so moued them, that either * they decreed Plutarebia that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was or therwise their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow Conful; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was advanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Province; vn-20 till by Embassadours, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vndcrstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be such, as hath beene alreadie told; the Senate appointed a strong supplie, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Eggrus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius fent thither in his place. Emylim, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much gravitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there affitthim with their aduice; or elfe to gouerne their 30 tongues at home, and not take vpon them to give directions by hearefay, and confure by idle reports: for he told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Emylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Canna, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselues the more gladly vnto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Conful.

All his businesse within the Citic being dispatched, Emylius was honourably attended, at his fetting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, 40 was more then could have beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusium: whence, when the winde came faire, he fet fayle at breake of day, and arrived fafely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done facrifice to _1pollo, after the fift day he fet forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perfess lay strongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordeable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and confequently, as little poffibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the 50 Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne myles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shoare and the foot of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Emplius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging anie nearer to the enemie, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward, being desended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durst not attempt 10 it: or perhaps could not get his foul diors to make the aduenture; they fearing leaft it would proue such a piece of worke, as had beene their march ouer offa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, euen at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the fouldiors, among other good lessons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Emylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. 20 Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were prouided for their journey: it being noyfed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were paffing the Mountaines (which was about 30 three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where hee lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Chanell of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a greatfall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay welneare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Emplius employed none fauc his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus hadraysed on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, 40 and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amylius persifled as he had begun; and continued his affault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: fince otherwise a good Captaine, as Emylius was knowne to be, would not have troubled himselfe with making such bravadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perfeus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselse no lesse (if notmore) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge : or rather without order, in all tu- 50 multuous hast, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedic retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and slings could doe little service, were beaten at handie stroakes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarck out of Polybins, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have beene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had beene effected by Martius in the yeare fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunitie.

Perfeus was in extreame doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning, Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making 10 defence. But farre worse counsaile prevailed : as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselse into anie one Towne, least that should be first of all befieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not over-carefully relieued. This was even the same that Amylius, or anic invador, should have defired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who flayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie, which, with greater feare than discretion, had hasted away from them, for saking the 20 Campe that was so notably well fortified: they defired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conful; praying him not to loofe occasion by delay. But Empless told him, That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, faue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand : and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to have the Campe meafured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good ley fure, hee fell 30 backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights reft, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the fame day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemie; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground scruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other fide, the Conful had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day. That cuening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conful, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie. 40 an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knownelong before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Braffe and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they faw it verified. Contrariwife, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyfe as long as the Eclipfe lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigic betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here 50 ftand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause anie alteration in ciuile affaires, and matters that have small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthie of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisdome of the wisest, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Emylim, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernatural thing, nor aboue the reach of humane vnderflanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anic denout regard thereof: yet could he not refraine from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with facrifice her deliuerie, as foone as the shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended even by Plutareh, a lage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not affilt him in this foolish denotion; yet is it like that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leffe foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely confumed, ere Hercules could be pleafed with anie Sacrifice, and vouchfate to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beasts. At 10 length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Amylius; but with condition, That hee should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had beflowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) your Mars the Father of Romalus, to whome belonged the guidance of militaric affaires; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Emylius was throughly perfuaded, that the 20 King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not have staved at Pridna. when, as a little before, his leyfure ferued to retyre whither hee lifted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conful thought that hee might wait upon advantage, without making anie great haste. Neither was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perfess kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Emylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which 30 whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer earnest desire. A horse brake loose at watering; which two or three of the Roman fouldiers followed into the river, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne fide. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was flaine. His countrimen feeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the river. Hereupon company came in to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordly as the maner of his Countrie, and the armes, 40 wherewith they ferued, did require. The ground was a flat levell, faue that on the fides a few hillocks were raifed here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better fourdiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conful encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Ilercules. It is the leffe maruaile, that hee durst adventure battaile, fince hee had bethought himselse of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the facrifice of a coward : whose vnseasonable denotion could be to no better than hypocrifie. For hee that will pray for agood Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than lost : and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, fuch as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did to floutly preffe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amylius was thereat much altonished; That the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them flaine, and the fquadrons following them so discouraged herewith. as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerse to the Romans; and which the Conful beholding, is faid to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his denoyre; the victorie might have bin his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, even from the beginning : the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Philanx long in order. For while it some of the Romanes small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were beld at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to bee done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vie, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction given by Amylius, when hee faw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vinequall, and 20 the rankes in some places open, by reason of the vnequal relitance which they found. Thus was the vsc of the Phalanx prooued vnauaileable against many small squadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynoscephala: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnferuiceable against the other, by reafon, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though heere were little such inconvenience of ground, as had beene at * Cyno- *Chap.4.$ x4.

Ccephala. Perlew, when he saw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pells. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing 30 the little good fer unce which they had done. As for the poore footesthey were left to the mercie of the Enemie: who flew about twentie thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost, in that bartaile, onely some sourcefcore, or fix fcore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and fuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himselfe; and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within 40 awhile to leffen. For hee fell to denifing vpon whom hee might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; he found his Pages and houshold servants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should shortly dare 50 some greater mischiese; he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Euander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about fine hundred cretians more for lone of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he coozened them of some part thereof; making shew asif hee would have redeemed it; but never paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townesmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Enander to speake what himselfe would have vttered. But the Ambhipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselues. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay therein garrison: sending them soorth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to to tarrie: butembarking himselse and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the river Strymon; passed over to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priniledge of the religious Sanctuarie

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Prdna which was necrest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippins who had kept the passage ouer 20 Ossagainst Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadourto Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in : yeelding themselnes and the Towns of Beraa, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Theffalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had for saken his Countrey: but opened their gates ypon such tearmes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armic. A. mylius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found 30 in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall have

It was soone understood, that Perfeu had taken Sanctuaric, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Conful confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fawour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill besceming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King PERSEVS to the Conful PAVLVS; the Conful, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine 40 the Title, refused to make answere thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheleffe in this conference, hee was marueilous earnest, that he might be eallowed to retaine the name of King. And to this ende it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserved his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with fuch vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie. nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at case, and be called King. Yea it feemes that hee had indeede, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this to Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war, he was dehorted by his friends, from feeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for *fuch a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eume-

nes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise, They vrge him to give place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercic of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Off auius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who affayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language to draw the King out of his lurking hole, wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not ferue, a question was mooned to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of 10 Sanctuaric, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and fend word to the King, That Enander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare him selfe in judgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestie, now past, makes them for beare to lay, that Perfeus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perfeus therefore willeth Enander to haue confideration of the little fauour that can bee expected at the Romans hand, 20 who are like to bee prefidents and ouerfeers of this judgement; so as it were better to die valiantly, fince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause, where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well: and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyfon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had flucke to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to for lake him: fo as none are left with him, faue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him vpon this occasion, will tell perilloustales, and fay, That the King hath lost the priviledge of this holy 30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme fo much, who shall dare to gaine fay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and even that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captiuitie; hee purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one shippe; who casily was perswaded to wast the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could bee so conneyed, was carried aboord by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and *children (if rather it were not true, that hee Plutarch in vit, had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his Liu lib. As a fonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by Lindib.420 40 arope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea side, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. Soit began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perfeus was fearching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that hee might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recouer the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging; and thinking it not fafe to enter it the common way, lest hee should bee taken; hee hid himselse in an obscure corner. His Pages miffing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians what socuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Mucedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custodie of his children, delivered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perfeus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselse, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of raigning therein; bee might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrarie hopes of saving his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that have beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Amylius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victoric ouer him-10 selfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the leffe to bee esteemed. Amylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hossile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might have beene returned by one of better soirit. As for Perseus, hee answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Conful tearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Confuls Table, and respectively entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeeres continuance: and 20 fuch end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

" Called now

Bout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armic of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readie to assist King Per-Seus as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had recei-ued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, allisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme 40 vnpossible to bee wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to give an affault. The Illyrians, that might eafily have defended themselues within the Towne, would needes iffue foorth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon foorthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours; by whom, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was 50 no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aliue. Having obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vpa Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Carauantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so soolish as to returne into Scodra. Hee sent messengers craving accesse vnto the Prætor: before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) hee fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were presently given vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill Perpenna, 10 one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius

20 Ow began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune : and tolooke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmannerly toward them before, whilest the Warre with Per/eus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; faying, that they were fent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; for a fmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grieuous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did con-30 gratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had fent this Embassage to Rome, not for love to Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the defire of some (couetous of the charge) to have Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengcance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any whit auerse from 40 the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or fent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slue themselves for scare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and leffe would have done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde fentence, and aducrtifed the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather *casarinora. the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedie to ransacke, than any just cause, apid salus, de had moued them thereto. This confideration, together with their good deserts line. in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians : among whome, none of any marke remained aliue, faue those that had beene of the Roman 50 Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate fuit, they could bee admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fayour which till now, they had not efteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselues terrible in SIIIII 3

all parts of Greece, Amylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrev : vifiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure; yet not forgetting to make them understand what power hee had ouer them. More than five hundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetrias were flaine at one time by those of the Roman faction. and with helpe of the Roman fouldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Conful. the redresse was such, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to fay, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, hee featled like a King, with excessive cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe : an easie matter, since no man durst be back- to ward in fending provisions, nor fet on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were lent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular infruction from the Senate than was viuall in fuch cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was fet at liberty by Amylius and the Embassadours, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was. That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the Kings. was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was divided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were fent captine into Italy, with their wines and children, as many as were aboue fifteene 20 veeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new given by Amilius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconvenience that should bee worse in the suture. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome; the things done to them could deserve no better name than meere tyrannic, yea and shamelesse perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, dorh make the Oathes of confederation feeme of no validitie. The Embaffadors that were fent to visit the Greekes, ealled before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discourred an unserviceable disposition towards the Ro- 30 mans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands : and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemics. But fince onely two men were beheaded, for having beene openly on the Macedonian fide; and fince it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no leffe afflicted in this inquifition, than they that had fold themselues to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to bee regarded by thein, having no Commission to make ordenounce Warre) and like to prove vn- 40 tractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of figne, by letters, or otherwife, whereby any one of the Achaens could be fuspitiously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their feruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vie the benefit of the time: wherein, fince all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season ferned firly to ranke the Acheans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was very vigent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should bee 50 made to pay for their mischieuous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfeus. This

This being so; he defired that all such men might be condemned, whom after sentence given, he would name vnto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole affembly) what justice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true faid Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should Hikewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I (hall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Voon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were To the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand: willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might even be tearmed the captinitie of Greece; wherein fo many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could bee remaining; since 20 honestie had beene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Acheans, nor yet held to bee offendors. But in stead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that thefe men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achains, who never ceafed to importune the Senate for their libertie, prevaile at all; vntill after seventeene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison. of having made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death

30 as malefactors. This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratific the Souldiours, gauc order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to facke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vie the libertie beflowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of enery Citic. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Silver which they had; and fent along with them, into every of their 40 Townes, what companies of men he thought conucnient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, every one the Towne whereinto hee was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiors; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots descrued punishment, as having favoured Perfeus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Remanes, had been already fent into Italie, there to receive their due; and fince this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present 50 in good obedience, but had, even in this warre, done good fervice to the Romans: I hold this act fo wicked that I should not beleeve it, had any one Writer delivered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that Go D was pleased to make Amylim childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great socuer otherwise his vertues were.

In

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before wee speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

A Prince, who as hee was flothfull by nature; fo the great loffe which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissmus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the Father of this man) [hall flart up a wilde per son, unworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King 20 did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Mpollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Macchabees take beginning. Which bookes feeme not to bee deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storic, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death 40 of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threefcore and scuenteenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second book. although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, flaine by Indas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the praclice of Islan the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prenailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and Super Eccles of other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Ionathan the brother and successor of 50 Indas remembreth in the Preamble of that Epiffle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had fent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Infephus

to had been about seuen yeeres King of Ægypt. Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Agypt four and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilest he was a childe. But they found such other busines. ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose ; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Calofyria, Phanice, and Indea, which hee had wonne by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Agyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee lived in the greater fecuritie. Hee left 20 behind him two fons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Philoon, with a daughter. Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chafed out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being fet vp against him. Phylcon hauing a frong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philametor held himselfe in Memphis, craning succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereo! Antiechus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by 30 all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the fonne of Mneftheus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to affilt the Kings

Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and defire of his Nephewes fafety and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contratic he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Joppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ieru. falem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) hee was with all 2.Mac.4. pompe and solemnitic received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Se-40 leucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of Macacagas

the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when hee would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernor of Calosyria and Phanicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said apollonius being firucken by the Angel of God, and recovering agains at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrific others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this lason, the brother of Onius, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselse, offered vnto the King three hundred and threefcore talents of filter, with other rents and fummes of money. Mac. 1.26.4. So hee got his defire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Infon, and his being over-reached by another in the samekinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vpamong the Acheans, when as that mischieuous Callierates, who had beene too hard for all worthic and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went

One

One fire than other burnes more forcibly. One Wolfe than other Wolnes does bite more fore; One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly. So one most mischieuous of men before, CALLICRATES, falle knaue as knaue might be. Met with MENALCIDAS more falle than be.

And even thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeeres after, was betraved. and overbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Prietthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flie 10 from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ieru/alem, Antiochus marched into Phanicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Agret; with which, Machental and with a mighty armic of land-forces, He went about toraigne ouer Ægypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Nauie, and moved warre against PTOLEMEVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMEVS was ofraid of him, and fled and

Verf. 18. 19.20. many were wounded to death. He wan many strong Cities, and tooke away the shoyles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL: Hee Shall enterinto

Dance 11. v. 24. the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor 20 his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria fo great a victorie ouer the Agyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For hee gave a notable Hierom.in Dan. Ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Casium, after which he entred, and fackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIO-CHVs had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Ifracl and Icrufalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden

Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Powring Veffels, and the Bowles, and the golden Bafons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. Hee tooke also the Silver and the Gold, and the 30.

precious Iewels, and the fecret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land after he had murdered many men. It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first layd claime to Calosyria; instifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene configned ouer to the Egyptian, or given Pulph.Legat. 81. in dowrie with Chopatra. Easie it was to approughis right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Acheans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by scuerall Embassages, to fome good conclusion. But his answere was that if the Alexandrians could be con- 40 tented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee faw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: hee thought it better to let the two brothers confume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any defire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weake cstate; the yonger, almost ruinated by his inuation; the elder hated and for faken by his people.

But how weake focuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so firong, that Antioches might leave them to the profecution thereof; and follow, at 50 good leifure, his other bufineffe at Ierusalem or ellewhere. So after the facke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch; and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Tharsians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Islan out of the Pricsthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, fole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: wherof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and fold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioining. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promised the same being now by Sostratus eagerly demanded. Hercof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iafon) had certaine knowledge, being mooned with zeale, and deteffing the facriledge of Menelaus, hee reprodued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

CHAP.6. S.II. of the Historie of the World.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, swecte Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a maner. abused to lust, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priniledge, from the holines of a ground confecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconvenience is far leffe, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to judge this fearefull shift which 20 Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the pooreold man: for Mene Lavstaking Andronicus apart, prayed him to flay Macdina ana, ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counfelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and per forading him to come out of the Sanctuary; so be flew him incontinently without any regard of righteousnesse. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, Hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie. and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against ONIAS, hee was Macres 4.0.38 Saine as amurderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should have

30 thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the fuit of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vesfels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outragious will, and not by any regard of justice: since he revenged the death of Onias. yet flue those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, Versar. yea, before the Scythians, they should have been beard as innocent. By reason of such

his vnsteadinesse, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, madde, in stead of Epiphanes, which fignifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Agypt, and then Maciaic, s.v.i. were there feene throughout all the Citie of Icrusalem, forty dayes long, horfemen sunning in the avre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troupes of Horsemen set in aray, encountring and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of Go D, all Histories have delivered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the City, after which there followed a flaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny Plindib. 2.0.57. tells vs, that Armies were seene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the eue-

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountaine powred out blood in stead of water, in or nearethe Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great flaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath de Prodigilib.8. collected many, and very remarkable. But this one feemeth to me the most memo- Vipera de Prifrable, because the most notorious. Sueton.Gal)a.

When Linia was first married to Angustus, an Eagle let sal into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Linia caused this Henne to bee carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultrie, and from the little branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerours did vse to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue, and after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they happened to wither, to fore shew the death of those persons to who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreouer, the heads of all the Casars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Angustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be evinworthy of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turnet ogood.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Agypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: so was his second Expedition capsed by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not firong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power 20 of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by persualion than by armes. Physicon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former fiege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitic of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) fince nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the yonger brother faw no likelihood of good iffue to bee hoped for without reconconciliation. These good helpes, and about all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee flood of his vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out 30 of Agypt with his armie; yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelustum; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Agypt, to his owne vie. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their fifter, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subject his yonger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently fur- 40 nilhed and fent out his Nau'e towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Calosyria, readie to enter £gypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather bee pleased to signific what hee required to have done in Agypt, which should bee performed, thanto enter it as an enemie with so puissant an Armie But Antiochus returned this short answere, That he would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citic of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that 50 hee should also abandon and leave vnto him the He of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demands, hee fet downea day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recoursed as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Ægypt it selfe; for Mem-phu, and all about it, received Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King having now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt flood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gaue fignification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to have the Kingdome to of Agypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not dor; being troubled with Per/ess; and therefore loth to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheleffe, the Agyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene suffained with food from Egypt , in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Leyptian, had Aratus laide the soundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had to Rhodes beene desended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for fundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers fent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans , Physican and Cleopatra had fent, a yeere fince : but their Embaffadours lay till in Rome. Of the Acheans they defired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might bee fent to them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybiu, Generall of the Horse. Hecreunto the Achiens readily condescended: and would immediatly 20 haue made performance; if Callierates had not interposed his milehieuous arte. Hee, whether feeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings defired; withflood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding vnto the Ftolemies. For it was not now (hee faide) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, what helpe focuer should bee required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge wordes, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that 40 Martius the late Confull had fignified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede othelpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Agyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwith standing, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Call crates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; hee brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Asheans were defired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had 50 done, by sending Embassadours to set Agypt in peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater bulinesse elsewhere, with such milde wordes, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the fame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durft not gaine-fay the Romane Councell : which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much diffresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus ouercome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Romane Senate, performe as much as any Armic could have done.

Audience had beene lately given by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physicon and Cleopatra; which having trayed more then a whole yeere in the City. brought nothing of their businesse to effect untill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them : though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometer, no leffe than his Brother and to

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or source veeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Enlaus, or Lenaus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely he determined to fet vpon Antiochus, for Calefyria; but would have interpoled himselse betweene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitratour: though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, hee fell on the sudden, by the 29 rebellion of his brother and subiects, to line under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, hee might have feemed to fland in no neede of such protection, hee hath remaining none other helpe whereby to faue both his Kingdome and life, than what can bee obtained by their intercession which were imployed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and lifter shewed it selfe, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorely clad; the haire of their heades and beardes ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their handes, branches of Oliuc. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groueling and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournefull, nor their 30 lookes and Countenances so lad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, befeeching them to have compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They saide that the people of Rome had so much hecretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased butto send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandrea, and with-draw his Armie out of 40 Agypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vied any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be shortly driven out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouch afed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betweenethole Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemie, and then Anticchus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and peo- 50 ple of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Agypt, Antiochus had transported his Armic ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met bim. Aftergreeting and falutations at their first encounter, Autiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did fo; and having a little while confidered of the businesse, hee tolde Popilies, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then give the Embassadours their answere. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which 10 hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him fuch an answere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King aftonished at this so rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had stayed and pawfed awhile, I will be content (quoth he) to doe what soeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the

Thus Antiochus departed out of Agypt, without anie good iffue of his conly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: Dancep.11. yea, fulfilling everie particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mif- version versions 20 chiefe to Ierufalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and settled the Kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother. and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Agyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadic giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards EVMENES. PRUSIAS, MASANISSA, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of PAVLYS, ANICIVS, and OCTAVIVS. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

Y this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Scnate; wee may perceive how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had been well contented, a yeare before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to give good language to the Acheans and Etolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such fort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Per-50 feus, and to crave helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Veriewelcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bade him be consident, and requested of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himfelfe; for it should surely be given him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee cyther approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratim a Phylician; whome Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Scnate, hee delinered the errand about which hee had beene fent; recounted his *Liu.lib.45. owne services done to the Romans in the late Warre, *wherewithall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requefted. That * Polyb, Legat. the Townes of Anus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himselfe. * By his omitting to fue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, to that he meant to crave another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him understand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his desire; but in the presents which they gauc to him (as was their custome to Embassadours that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheleffe, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had alreadie graunted. This did so highly difplease the Senate, that whilest hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Enus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallogreekes, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they fent Embassa-20 dours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: fince, by his malice to Perseus, he had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemie, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of fingular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would per- 30 mit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereoffent him home, without expence of much further

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kiffed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a flaue, and one that by fuch abject flatteric kept himselfe40 fafe; though doing otherwife greater mischiefe than anie wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne N icomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would have beene vnjust, he received a cold answere. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was vndertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Agypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gave vnto the children of Kings, that were to their pa-

But aboue all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controucrsies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this opprelfion) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay fine hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leylure to deuise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniffa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed . Hee fent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perseus; and offered to come this 10 ther himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy vnto supiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseu, might be set at libertie for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; fince hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giving hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carrie himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His King-20 dome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappic Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emplius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suite to Emylius, that hee might not be put to fuch difgrace: but hee still received one skornefull answere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himselfe. And furely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather have fought his death in Macedon, than have beene beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman 20 clemencie, whereof Amylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had beene ledde in chaynes through the freetes, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe facrifice, hee should command the captines to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vimost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus : yet so, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther familhed himselfe, or (for it is diversly reported) was 40 kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of fleepe. Of his fonnes, two died; it is uncertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner. or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon; and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perfeus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day bee compelled to earne his living by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is 50 like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignetie, have commaunded those poore men to be slaine, which had recoursed his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been verie gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertroden wretches, are all subject vnto One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done vonto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie , wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One bath said truly:

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controlle: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. Goo, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted fuch power to verie few : among whome alfo, verie few there are, that vie it not to their owne burt. For who fees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soucraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (befides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne some nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, not with flanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole 20 house, yet raigning oner all? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hercof. Hercto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had be obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish 30 the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the cuill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to con-*The true Law ceine and teach, That * Goo is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster, that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

of free Monarchies.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Emylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the 40 quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the civill Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Casar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have beene hindered by the fouldiors; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased Goo to take away from him his two remayning sonnes, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one died fine dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes 50 after it. This loffe hee bore wifely: and told the People, That hee hoped to fee the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne private calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About

About the same time, Offauius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent fpectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citic, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maieflie, that thy deferts baue purchased.

DY this which we have alreadic fet downe, is seene the beginning and end of 10 D the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have beene preserved, and yet remaine among vs; and 20 withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, the greatest Lords of the world have beene stirred vo. rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and fo many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, fo is it to the dead of no vse at all because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnder-30 flood by them which are diffolued; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolne out of the world without noise; than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltic, by giving in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and infolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with fo many and fo variable forts of forrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath been no State searefull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the West any Prince that hath spred his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard, who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the 40 Moores out of Granade, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is casie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing fireames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be so regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and fincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spaine.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundleffe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bin already faid; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of GoD, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdome of the world. without speaking a word; which GoD with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleeved; GoD, which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I have considered (faith SALOMON) all the workes that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, 10 and vexation of spirit: but who beleeves it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to reftore Nauerre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that inflice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindel and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that filles his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the 20 most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou onely hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre ftretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hie inset.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewne out; besides many other discouragements, 30 perswading my silence; it hath pleased G o p to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspeakeable and neuer enough lamented loffe, hath taught me to fay with I os, Ver faeft in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

To the Reader.

He vee of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to anie length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, yearely fet downe all Occurrences not coharent. This heere following, may ferue as an Index to the prefent Part of this Worke; pointing vnto the severall matters, that having fallen

10 out at one time, are farre dissoyned in the Relation. Certainely it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that anie can be. For how soener the yeares of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have beene well-neere compleat, yet in the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and I fract, wee finde manie fractions, and the last years, or years, of one King reckened also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manie other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diverse and imperfect formes of the yeare, which were in vie among fundrie Nations: caufing the * Summer * See Lib. 1. Moneths, in processe of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extreme Chap.3.5.6. confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse, out of so manie, and so viterly disagreeing computations, as have alreadie gotten an-20 thoritie, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuse of such error as a more intentine and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may ferue to free the Booke, and likewife the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from anie notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbring of yeares, but for some hastie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne eafe.

The Titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them; 30 as will readily be conceined. Where two Titles, or more, are over the head, as Nahanasar there doe the numbers underneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be understood, That I E HO S OP HAT began his raigne in the 3774. of the IVLIAN Era, in the 2092. of the World, and in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needes not more illustration; nor indeede so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To avoid prolixitie, I have forborne to infert those yeares, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident : as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Government; some 40 Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETUS raigned over the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, unto the 17, wherein SYLVIVS A-VENTINUS succeeded, and wherein I EHORAM fo st raigned with I EHOSOPHAT bis father. For I thoubt it vaine to boue filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and fo fill onwards, till I had come to the first of A VENTI-NVS. and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In letting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of euerie one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fift, seventh, or so forth, in ranke, of those that raigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeare of his raigne; at the end, or foct 50 of the name (as the pace gives leave) is the whole number of yeares in which he raigned; in the spaces following underneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be understood, that the Same yeare helonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of his fore-goers: as the first years of IEHORAN King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHAZIA, and the 22. of his father AHAB. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 2077, yeare of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that everie one of them raigned in some part of the same yeare; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the first of OMRI. Particularly, under the yeares of the Agyptian Kings are let downe the yeares of those Dynasties. which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, other whiles, the day of the moneth upon which NABONASSARS yeare began: which, how it varied from other yeares, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeres, from IPHITVS, who began the Olympiads, 10 from Rome built, from NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath beene (aid, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that under the title of Olympiads is fet downe first the number of the Olympiad. and beneath it, the yeare of that Olympiad: as that Cyr vs began his raigne in Persia.

Now, for that the yeares of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONAS-SAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their seucrall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their seucrall Columnes; opposing part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I have here done) 20 cutting all overthwart with one streight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than vefull; since the more part would not baue apprehended the meaning, and fince the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to obserue, that howsoeuer the Era of the Olympiads be 24. yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may have begun at such a time of the yeare as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will eafily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queene Elizabeth began her raigne the 17. of Nouember, in the yeare of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw downe Images; and reformed manie things in Re- 20 ligion; all in her first yeare: yet not all in that yeare 1558, but the greater part in the yeare following; whether we begin with the first of Ianuarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be other whiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole

The IVLIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the yeares of the World, was deuised by that honorable and excellently learned IOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IVLIAN yeares, now in vse among vs. It consists th of 7980 yeares; which refult from the multiplication of 19.28. and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being divided by anie of thefe, it leaves the number of the present yeare; or if no fraction remaine, it showes the last 40 yeare of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Canna, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by dividing the Same number of the IVLIAN Period 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period, after the prefent accompt, alwayes exceedes the yeares of the World by 682. Besides the former ves, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeare, than anie other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine po-

More I shall not need to write, as touching the vse or explication of these Tables. Nei- 50 ther was thus much requisite to such as are connersant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
